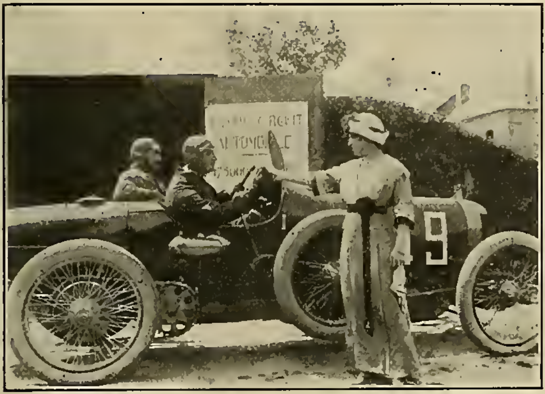
Laura Sawyer's clever dramatic work has again been brought out in the detective stories in which she is playing the leading part. Her performances are invariably forceful and she shows remarkable powers of repression in scenes which less capable players would spoil by over acting.

The Wheel of Destruction.

A Thrilling Two-Part Eclectic Feature.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

IT only happens about once in a blue moon that a cameraman is on the spot with his instrument to record a genuine accident that is dramatic enough to be the basis of a thrilling picture. Most accidents are photographed only in part or after the fact, leaving something to be desired, or faked, or both, as the case may be. In this instance the Eclectic cameraman was on the spot and turning the crank with no idea that he was soon to get one of the most complete pictures of a motor car accident that has ever been recorded. It shows the occurrence from the first appearance of the car until it turns turtle and the occupants are carried away from the scene; including the agitation of the large number of spectators.



Scene from "The Wheel of Destruction" (Eclectic).

This accident happened at the course through Rouen, France, and environs, during the recent international motor contest. There were cameramen stationed along the course grinding in a perfunctory way, taking views of an ordinary auto race. One of them got this excellent record of the wreck, and around that scene was written "The Wheel of Destiny." Therefore, it will be readily seen that this picture has a punch in it that is far above the average, and one that is as thrilling as it is genuine. The car comes around a curve at breakneck speed, trembles and staggers for a moment, like a wounded deer, and then turns completely over. The two occupants are thrown upon the road and lie prostrate until carried away. Meanwhile the crowd is in a frenzy of excitement that no director in the world could simulate by counterfeited action. It is one of the most remarkable scenes ever shown upon a screen.

The story that has been written around this scene is logical and capably acted. There is a young lady, Helen by name, who is bethrothed to a wealthy young man. She is expecting her lover to place the engagement ring on her finger at evening. In the afternoon she goes for a drive and her horse runs away. The runaway is stopped by Lewis, a noted racing motorist, who is injured by saving Helen. The girl takes him home and has his wounds attended. At night her fiancee comes with the ring, but she is so impressed with the bravery of Lewis that she accepts the ring with indifference. The lover on hearing the tale realizes that he has a rival in Helen's affections and he at once contrives to get Lewis out of the way.

On the night before the great race he gets into Lewis' garage and, although the action is not shown, we know from later developments that he saws the steering rod nearly in two. Helen is on hand to wish Lewis luck and the race begins. Numerous exciting glimpses of the race are shown before the accident occurs. Lewis is carried to a field hospital. Helen and her fiance are beside the cot when the sawed steering rod is brought in and handed to the man who sawed it. His emotions betray him and he confesses his deed. Lewis loses the auto race but wins in the race for happiness.

As a feature this should prove to be a corker. Anyone who sees it will get his money's worth, even if it costs him a dollar, and may then come back and see it again. This is putting it pretty strong, but the picture speaks for itself.

Kinemacolor Licensed.

Motion Picture Patents Company Lets Down the Bars—Contracts Signed and All Licensed Houses May Use Service.

IT has been a long hard fight for recognition that has been waged by the promoters of Kinemacolor motion pictures in America and there is corresponding joy at the company's offices in the Mecca Building over the happy culmination of that fight—an unconditional license from the Motion Picture Patents Company permitting Kinemacolor to install its service in any licensed picture theater which desires to strengthen its program by the addition.

The contracts which officially and legally included Kinemacolor in the list of licensed manufacturers was signed by the proper officers of both companies last Wednesday and announcements will be issued by the Patents Company in due form. The Kinemacolor people are enthusiastic over the outlook for business now that the most serious obstacle to the company's progress has been removed.

Extensive preparations are being made to take care of the new business. A school of instruction for operators has been opened and the proper method of handling Kinemacolor film is being carefully taught. A large number of contracts for service have already been consumated and it is more than likely that Kinemacolor will be shown in every city in the country before the end of the year.

NEW FAMOUS PLAYERS POLICY APPROVED.

The Famous Players Film Company's announcement last week to the effect that beginning September 1st, it would release three feature productions a month of the same standard maintained in the past, is being generally and favorably commented upon. Interpreting the majority of opinions, this extension of Famous Players activities was anticipated. The necessity for expansion was forcibly suggested to the exhibitors and state-right buyers throughout the country by the growing and persistent demand for Famous Players' productions, and the inauguration of a plan of regular releases is certain of popular endorsement.

BROENING WITH FAMOUS PLAYERS.

H. Lyman Broening, responsible for the very unusual and conspicuous camera work of the Monopol Film Company in the past, has severed his connections with that concern and has been engaged by the Famous Players Film Company as cameraman for the productions directed by J. Searle Dawley. Mr. Dawley as director and Mr. Broening as cameraman should be able to duet well.

ENGAGEMENT NOTE A JOKE.

Sometimes a studio joke gets into circulation as the real thing. An instance of this kind happened recently when the World announced the engagement of Joseph E. Singleton and Miss Iva Shepard, the item being contributed by the joyous dopester who writes bunk for the Universal at the Los Angeles studios. Miss Shepard writes us to make the statement that there is nothing to the original story, which we do with pleasure, at the same time regretting that the young lady should have been made the butt of a practical joke.

DANIEL IN THE LION'S DEN (Vitagraph).

The Vitagraph Company announces that it has produced and completed a remarkable three-reel feature, entitled "Daniel in the Lion's Den," which will be released in the near future. The fiery furnace is also included in the picture. Charles Kent plays the part of Daniel, and appears in several of the scenes surrounded by a half dozen handsome young lions. The work has been very painstaking and it should make a great picture.

AUSTRALIAN RIGHTS FOR "THE STREETS OF NEW YORK."

A representative of the Australian Film Company visited the plant of the Pilot Company last week and reviewed their three-reel feature, "The Streets of New York." He remarked on the good acting of the principals, the high standard of photography, and the capable directing. Before leaving the studio he closed for the exclusive Australian rights to this feature.

The Turner & Dahnken Circuit of Pantages Building, San Francisco, Cal., have recently installed double automatic ticket selling machines in every theater in their entire circuit on the Pacific coast.

FLICKERS

I WONDER if there is anyone in the game that does not know this fellow. He is known as Joe Brandt, the joy dispenser and general booster of Universal films, and is one of the many who are just recovering from the effects of the big New York convention. Joe has managed to keep himself so busy with details of filmdom that it is difficult to imagine him as being associated with any other business, yet records show that in 1906 he was admitted as an attorney to the bar of New York State (and has never been refused admittance to any other bar since). Joe served some time in the New York office of the Billboard as manager, and later was identified as advertising manager of the Dramatic Mirror. About two years ago Carl Laemmle engaged Brandt as private secretary, and when the Universal Film Mfg. was formed, he assumed the position of advertising and publicity manager. His most recent appointment is that of assistant treasurer to the Universal.

If you happen in the neighborhood of west fortieth street, and want a smoke, drop in to see Mr. Oes, manager of the Great Northern Film Co., he has a box of one hundred which he is just dying to give away. When purchasing, he listened to the old story and sampled the center one. It was good, but the others—Oh, my. Excuse me just a minute.

Hub Taylor also fell for the cigar trick, only when the merchandise was carried as far as the Exclusive Supply Corporation camp, the salesman was glad to get anything he was offered, and as a result, Taylor got his for $3.50 per hundred, two dollars less than the price paid by Oes.

Mr. George Kleine, of Chicago, was a very welcome visitor to the offices of the Moving Picture World last week. After attending to a few little business details, he invited Jim Hoff and myself to accompany him on the maiden trip of his new six cylinder Pierce Arrow touring car to Brighton Beach. It was "some car," "some ride" and "some entertainment."

AN ENTERPRISING PICTURE MAN.

Richard Earl McCray, of Fairmont, W. Va., started into the theatrical business many years ago as program boy at the old Opera House in Fairmont. He went from there to the Grand Opera House in the same city as an usher. After serving in this capacity for several years he became advertising manager for that house. He retained this position until 1909, when he, with his brother Frank C. McCray and Robt. E. Fisher, organized the McCray, Fisher & McCray Circuit of Theaters and the West Virginia Booking Agency, with offices at Fairmont, W. Va. Mr. Fisher was only with the firm a short while when his interests were purchased by the McCray Brothers and the name of the company was changed to McCray & McCray. In 1910, owing to the poor prospects ahead for the success of a circuit of legitimate theaters, McCray & McCray changed the policy of their house to that of moving picture supplies exclusively, and they now have the only exclusive supply house in West Virginia. R. E. McCray is president of The McCray Theater Co., a corporation controlling The Colonial Theater, one of the largest and finest equipped picture theaters not only in Fairmont and the state, but also one of the best in the South. He is one of the organizers of the West Virginia Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and was a delegate from this branch to the National Convention at New York City in July. Mr. McCray is also president of The McCray System of Out Door Advertising of Fairmont, controls the bill posting and bulletin business in Central West Virginia.

WITH HONOR IN HIS OWN LAND.

Mighty scarce is the prophet with honor in his own land. And in his own filmland. It is funny how many film producing plants are located in places that have few picture houses showing the home-made brand of film. Often a visitor to a studio will marvel at the spectacle of theaters all around showing every film but the one produced right next door. The brand that is manufactured a thousand miles away is heavily featured in these shows, though, and on the other hand, the nearby studio is likely turning out a film that is in demand in every "pic-show" in India. Just the same, C. J. Hite sends the World word that of five picture shows in New Rochelle, four are showing the Thanhouser product.

NEW BLOOD IN SELIG STUDIO.

Quite a few new players have been added to the Selig studio forces. Al. Filson, has been working now and then at the Los Angeles studio and has been joined recently by his wife, Lea Errol. The two will put on some of their famous vaudeville sketches. Joseph King, W. K. Rhyne, Norval MacGregor, Miss Mabel Van Buren and E. J. LeSaint have also joined the Edendale company. Elmer Grandon, formerly actor and director with the Imp company, is now with Selig bringing with him Guy Oliver, Stella Rosetta, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Brown, Betty Shade, Madeline Post, Ethel Davis and Francis Newberg.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE much agitated ventilation question was shelved for a time at the afternoon meeting of the council, July 31. Alderman Schaeffer had presented an order to the council Monday, July 28, at the night session, for the suspension of the enforcement of the building ordinances, relating to ventilation requirements in theaters. This order was deferred and published and, as has been stated, it was brought up and passed at the last session before the annual vacation.

The ordinance of 1910 regulates ventilation in theaters, halls, lodge rooms and churches. Moving picture theaters were made the special objects of the health department's investigations, and so severely were they dealt with that many owners were threatened with ruin. Alderman Schaeffer rightly believed that the ordinance should be modified, and he introduced a resolution to that effect before the committee on buildings, which is still pending. Until that order is passed upon, the council has directed that the ordinance be not enforced.

While the Chicago health department is to be commended for its excellent work, it must be said of the officers that they carried things with a high hand in their attempt to enforce the terms of an ordinance that would be confiscatory in many cases, if enforced, so far as moving picture theaters are concerned. There is good ground for believing that the ventilation section of the 1910 ordinance was quietly introduced and passed at the instigation of several firms in the city, whose business was chiefly concerned in the manufacture and sale of ventilating systems. It is strange that this particular section of the ordinance had remained inoperative until a little over six months ago, and that moving picture theaters were especially pounced upon for its enforcement.

By all means let us have good ventilation in our theaters, but not at the expense of depriving many well meaning people of their property and means of livelihood.

Moving Pictures on Big Liners.

For some time past it has been attempted by exploiters of moving pictures to get concessions from trans-Atlantic companies for the showing of moving picture programs aboard the big liners. The chief obstacle in the way, thus far, has been the opposition of fire underwriters, on the ground of increased risk, owing to the use of inflammable films. Now that promoters of the plan are in a position to guarantee non-flam films they are pressing the adoption of their scheme with still greater zeal.

The promoters plan to give picture programs on twelve of the largest North Atlantic steamers and they hope to secure permits before the big rush homewards to American shores is made this fall. First and second cabin passengers only will be catered to, and, since no direct charge is permitted to be made to passengers, it is expected that enough money will be made by subscriptions.

Bruce Ismay, of Titanic notoriety, chairman of the White Star line, is said to discourage the plan. He is reported to have said: "If we start this sort of thing we shall soon have to engage Melba for one of our boats, because the rival line has secured the services of Caruso." It is believed, however, that if the underwriters are won over, permits will be granted.

Satex Product Still Released by Warners.

F. M. Sanford, secretary and treasurer of the Satex Film Company, Austin, Texas, called at the World office while passing through the city to St. Louis and Austin, Monday, August 4th. Mr. Sanford stated that Warner's Features, Inc., by which organization the Satex product will be released as formerly, has been incorporated for a large amount, of which one-half has been paid up, in conformity with the laws of the State of New York.

The Satex Company will release one three-reel feature every three weeks, it being understood that any further increase in the output will also be taken care of. Other companies allied with the Warner's incorporation are the Gene Gauntier and the Pyramid (Crystal). By special agreement the Satex Film Company is empowered to draw on the two companies of P. A. Powers at Los Angeles, now under the management of Thomas Evans, for dramatic talent, cameramen, directors, etc., in order to strengthen its product. Mr. Sanford stated that the first three-reel picture of the Satex will be released September 15th. The new program of the Warner's Feature, Inc., will be launched Monday, September 14th.

Denver Ablaze with Splendor for Knights Templar.

About the time this article is read, the hosts of the Knights Templar will descend upon the city of Denver, and the eyes of the pilgrims will be dazzled and their minds sent into a whirl by the blinding lights and the riotous bursts of color with which the streets will be decorated. From the clouds in the sky to the asphalt on the thoroughfares, there will be one continuous burst of splendor to which the rainbow and the lightning have contributed their fullest stores; and behind it all a motion picture man has been one of the chief designers of the magnificent and novel effects, the equal of which has never before been even dreamed of in decorating a city.

About a year ago the preparations began. The electric light people in Denver are famous for their efforts in decorative lighting and they spare no effort nor expense in accomplishing the seemingly impossible. When the plans for the August conclave were first taken up, the Denver Gas and Electric Light Company sent for H. H. Buckwalter and asked him to submit ideas for something greater than had ever before been attempted. George Williamson, of the light company, was placed in charge of the work with instructions to spend any amount of money in carrying out the suggestions. Buckwalter grabbed a pad of paper and pencil and started to work out a "court of honor," to extend over five blocks in the center of the city. This was soon elaborated into details embracing a hundred electric fountains gleaming with prismatic colors and dazzling with electric lights. A dozen different ideas were submitted and each was instantly accepted. Buckwalter was made a member of the committee on illumination, but his work was not of the deliberative sort. He preferred execution of ideas and concrete products rather than conversation, with the result that nearly a month before the coming of the Templars, the streets were lined with immense structures and figures, carefully draped from view. The local press held back the story, the plan being to spring the big surprise when the show opens, and then flood it with pictures and details just before the Knights enter the city gates.

In addition to the "court of honor" and the fountains and such creations, Buckwalter submitted a plan for an immense flaming cross to be sent nearly a mile into the heavens. This was at first looked upon as impossible, but after submitting the plan to Ivy Baldwin, the aeronaut, an immense gas balloon was built to carry aloft the framework on which thousands of tungsten lamps will be fixed. Phosphor bronze stay wires, carrying current as well as holding the balloon in position, will be anchored from corners six city blocks apart, forming the base of a wire square to hold the immense silken bag in place, in any possible wind. This has been tried out with complete success, and, in addition to the cross, there will be other electric designs sent into the sky, some of them most novel in character.

The town of Manitou, seventy-five miles from Denver, will also use some of Buckwalter's ideas in attracting and entertaining the Templar visitors. Here a battery of immense searchlights will illuminate Pike's Peak and the foothills, on the slopes of which various K. T. emblems will be worked in enormous size, by means of white canvas securely spiked to the ground.

Buckwalter's personal work during the conclave, when 150,000 visitors will enter the city, will be the entertainment of the guests by Colorado Commandery No. 1. This is the ranking body of Templars in the West and on it will devolve the position of host. Buckwalter is chairman of the entertainment committee and what novelties he has in store will not be given previous announcement. Colorado commandery has secured El Jebel Shrine temple, one of the largest and most beautiful structures of the kind in the world, and here the motion picture man will act as boss and see that every person who enters will be dazzled with the entertainment provided, for there will be something doing on every floor from the basement to the roof garden.

Nor must it be overlooked for one moment that "Buck" will see to it that all the illuminative splendor, the brilliant pageantry and the gay throngs of sight-seers will be preserved in moving pictures.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Joe Howard's Theater, formerly the Whitney Opera House, this city, opened Sunday, August 3, with Kleine-Cines "Quo Vadis?" This now makes the fourth Chicago house in which the big photodrama is being run concurrently.

F. O. Nielsen and family returned from a month's vacation in several Northern States, on Wednesday, August 6.

Mr. Nielsen, who owns the high class Parkway Theater, on North Clark Street, will open that favorite resort in a few days.

The M. & F. Feature Film Company have just purchased from the New York Film Company the four-reel feature, "Torture Within Prison Wall." Mr. Mundstock states that a beautiful line of one, three and six-sheet posters will accompany these films.

A. Asbuch, 1948 Burling Street, Chicago, contemplates the building in the near future of a modern moving picture theater. In case he is offered the right house in the right locality, he will purchase instead of building. Mr. Asbuch has been familiarizing himself for some time with all the requirements of a manager, and purchased a Handbook when he called at the World office.

R. R. Nehls, manager of the American Film Manufacturing Company, was presented with a healthy young daughter, age 3 hours, at the time of his arrival from the National Convention and Exposition in New York City. Mrs. Nehls and daughter are in excellent health, and the happy parents are receiving numerous congratulations. One friend, unaware of the fact that Mr. Nehls is connected with the American Film Manufacturing Company, congratulated him on the arrival of a young American queen.

W. L. Jennings, of Monroe, La., who, with Mrs. M. W. Hoyt, of this city, owned and operated the Lyceum Theater at Monroe, was a visitor at our Chicago office last week. Mr. Jennings stated that he had disposed of the Lyceum Theater to the Saenger Bros., of Shreveport, La., who own three houses in that city and are now forming a circuit through northern Louisiana. Two years ago, Mrs. Hoyt and Mr. Jennings purchased the Lyceum from the Pearce Syndicate, of New Orleans, for the sum of $30,000 and sold it to the Saenger Bros. for $40,000. Mr. Jennings was a delegate to the national convention at New York, and was one of the principal organizers of the league in New Orleans, acting as temporary secretary, under President Neff, during its organization. Mr. Jennings is looking for a location in Chicago, and expressed considerable surprise at the advancement made by photoplay theaters in this city. The Lyceum Theater in Monroe has a capacity of 500 and is considered one of the most attractive theaters in the South, and from a financial standpoint has proven a successful proposition. Mr. Jennings was also interested in the Maze Theater, Monroe.

A GREAT NORTHERN FEATURE.

Under the title of "A Woman Scorned," or "The Last of the Old Mill" the Great Northern Special Feature Co. has again successfully produced a multiple reel photo-drama which carries with it the needed element of plot foundation and a superstructure of excellent acting and splendid photography. The outdoor surroundings in which the plot of the drama is enacted for a considerable period, are characteristic of Nordisk beauty and clarity. The interiors, especially that in the old mill, are convincing, to say the least and the fiery climax, in which the old structure tetters and falls under the flames, is an excellent example of advanced cinematography.

The story is one calculated to hold attention because of the strong element that is developed out of the unusual situations that are brought about by the jealousy of an elder sister for her junior. There is much of a picturesque nature introduced in leading up to the thrilling situations which go to form the climax of the production. The starting of the mill fans as a means of permitting the hero to summon assistance, the tense interest while his sweetheart is held a prisoner, the fire and its exciting sequels are sufficiently "sensational," class this feature well to the fore in the list of multiple reels out of the ordinary.

The Great Northern Company has added several new stars to its acting forces and several of these have been assigned to play important roles in this latest feature production. Their performance speaks the facts that they have been thoroughly trained in their art.

KLEINE RELEASE UNDER NEW NAME.

"The House of Mystery" was the title of the Kleine-Cines release for August 8th. It has been learned, however, that another picture bearing this name has recently been released and the Kleine-Cines release will therefore be entitled "By Unseen Hands." Arrangements have been issued for this subject.

REORGANIZING NEW YORK STATE LEAGUE.

President Neff and His Lieutenants Will Hold State Convention in Syracuse on Monday.

The work of reorganizing the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of New York State will be undertaken at a convention to be held at the Yates Hotel at 10:30 o'clock Monday morning, August 11. For the past two weeks agents of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League have been working throughout the State urging exhibitors to attend this meeting and assurances of a large meeting have been given. President Neff will be present, assisted by L. R. Thomas and Clem Kerr, organizers, and Sidney Ascher, T. A. Kepler, R. L. Macnab, of New York City, will help out.

The movement started by the bolting delegations to form a rival organization has died from inanition and nothing will be done along those lines. This leaves the exhibitors without national connection with the trade, and the only thing for New York exhibitors to do is to get into the new State branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

President Neff arrived in New York Wednesday and attended a conference with Frank L. Dyer, of the General Film Company; Carl Laemmle, of the Universal Company, and W. C. Toomey, of the Mutual Film Corporation, on Thursday. Immediately thereafter he left for Syracuse for the State Convention. He said that the action of the New York and Chicago delegations in bolting the National Convention in New York has not appreciably affected the status of the National organization, and that he was in daily receipt of assurances of support and confidence from all over the country. Several States that have never before shown interest in the Exhibitors' League have formed organizations and are now in line.

Members of the Indiana League generally repudiate the action of its delegates and F. J. Rembusch, the National vice-president for that State, personally assured President Neff that he did not indorse the action of his colleagues at the New York convention and was greatly surprised when he learned that they had walked out of the convention. A movement is now well under way to reorganize the Indiana League.

In Pennsylvania, Secretary Harry Reiff, of Pittsburgh, is securing many new members whom it was impossible to bring into the organization while Herrington, Victor and others who were numbered among the bolting delegates belonged to the league.

In Illinois organizers are working the State and will soon have a large membership in the territory long neglected by the former State organization, whose principal members are in Chicago and support the bolters from the New York convention.

President Neff assured the Moving Picture World that the authors of the several statements issued for the purpose of explaining why the bolt occurred at the New York convention would never be able to prove their statements, which he branded as false in every particular.

Secretary George W. Wiley, of the National League, has established his headquarters at the World Theater, 8th and Highland Avenues, Kansas City, Mo.

As a mark of the esteem in which President Neff is held by the exhibitors of his own town, the Cincinnati League adopted a resolution at a recent meeting appropriating $500 from its treasury to assist in the work of the National League.

MINNESOTA ENDORSES BOLTERS.

Thomas Furniss, formerly national vice-president of the National League and one of the delegates who bolted the convention in New York, writes that the executive committee of the Minnesota League has endorsed the action of the Minnesota delegates in walking out of the convention. He also announces that the Minnesota exhibitors will hold a convention on the first Thursday in September at St. Paul.

LAWYER IMPRESSED IN "LEAD."

William Russell, as district attorney, in "The Missing Witness," a Thanhouser two-reeler, fronts a real lawyer, playing the attorney for the defence. "The Missing Witness" is released Tuesday, August 12th. Jacob Ruskin, the genuine lawyer who plays a lawyer, was originally called on by Director Heffron to oversee the "dressing" of the court room scenes in the subject. The man originally cast for the part of attorney for the defence, failed to show up, and Mr. Heffron rehearsed Ruskin in the role. The lawyer showed no stage fright and his performance in rehearsal was so satisfactory that he was kept in the cast. Regular actor Russell wonders if he could walk into a court room in place of some regular lawyer and make good that way.

Doings at Los Angeles

Local Tradesmen Overcharge Picture Companies for Supplies —May Lose Valuable Patronage—Many Interesting News Notes.

A WIDELY prevalent practice among merchants and others maintaining business relations with motion picture producing companies, whereby it is the custom to charge the producing companies a substantially higher price for merchandise and services than other lines of business are charged, has long been the subject of bitter complaint among the many producing companies which are located in Southern California.

The practice probably prevails in other places where motion pictures are made, but here it is particularly noticeable because of the great number of companies which do business here. Merchants do not pretend to regard the business of the film companies as less desirable, and it is not on this account that the excessive prices are charged. On the contrary, the film companies are heavy and consistent buyers of supplies used as a matter of routine, and in nearly every studio payments are prompt and certain.

At some time, however, the impression spread abroad that the film companies were making huge sums of easy money and were careless and liberal spenders. Undoubtedly that was true in the early days, but as the concerns have become better organized, more businesslike systems are being introduced. Hence, within the last year or so, it has been discovered that a strong and steady "gouge" is being worked.

One of the largest producing companies in Southern California now buys practically all of its costumes in the East because the local costumers were charging excessive prices, and an Eastern costumer was discovered who has not yet become infected with the insidious plague. Another concern is building its own furniture factory to escape being robbed. One shrewd producer, who pays cash for everything he gets, buys through friends not connected with the motion picture business.

Recently the evil has assumed such proportions that the actors have experienced attempts to overcharge them for personal purchases when they were known to be in motion pictures.

Directors find it harder and harder to obtain backgrounds or "locations" without submitting to a "holdup." Again and again companies have been forced to pay out excessive bonuses before being permitted to make scenes in locations which should have cost them nothing. The public is learning that when a director has decided on a certain background for a scene he will often pay $5 or $10, or even $25, rather than dispense with it. One of the causes of this latter situation is that two or three well-known directors who have worked a great deal in Southern California have been notorious for their careless prodigality and have thrown money about right and left in payment of trifling favors and accommodations.

The growth of this holdup game within the last year has been so vigorous as to impress forcibly upon the companies the fact that unless they take steps soon to combat it they will be forced to leave Southern California. This was one of the things Fred J. Balshofer, manager of the New York Motion Picture Company, had in mind when he called an informal meeting of all the producers, managers and studio heads of motion picture companies in Southern California. The meeting was held in the Alexandria Hotel, in this city, the night of July 12, and nearly all of the companies, both licensed and independent, were represented. The probability is that some kind of a small, permanent business organization for mutual protection will grow out of the plans which were discussed at this conference, and it may be also that the organization will have some social significance.

Permanency at Los Angeles.

The decision of William Selig to move all but two of his producing companies to Los Angeles promises to make the Selig organization, in the very near future, the largest motion picture producing plant in Southern California, which is the home of several of the big ones. This is especially true when in connection with the announcement of the removal of several additional companies to the Coast, the extensive improvements and enlargements of the plant, projected by Mr. Selig on the occasion of his last visit here, are in progress. At both the Edendale plant and at the Wild Animal Farm, in another portion of the city, much constructive work is being done. Traveling with three special cars, a large contingent from the Chicago studio arrived here this week, and others have been coming or will follow on the regular trains.

In connection with the practical transfer of the Selig headquarters to Los Angeles, a rumor concerning the Biograph Company is not without interest. The lease on the large area at Pico and Georgia Streets, which the Biograph has occupied for several seasons, will expire this fall and it is said that a real estate agent, representing the company, has been investigating close-in sites available for the purposes of a big permanent studio and factory. This is probably the source of the report that the Biograph headquarters are to be moved to Los Angeles, with only the distributing end in New York. A number of the members of the Biograph Company remained behind when the organization went East last month, and the reason given was that the organization will return earlier than usual this year and it was not considered worth while to move all the people East, only to return them to the Coast again in October or November.

There are now eight sections of the Selig Company, four working at Edendale and four at the Animal Farm. The Edendale divisions are in charge of Directors Campbell, LeSaint, Huntly and Parker respectively, and Directors Grandon, Kirkland, Martin and Duncan are making their headquarters at the Farm. Colin Campbell is directing the eight-reel film production of Rex Beach's story, "The Spoilers." The Selig Company is apparently sparing no expense in putting this on right. Recently Campbell took his full cast and a number of extra people to San Francisco for a number of locations. While they were away workmen were building a complete mining camp near San Fernando, which was used for a series of the scenes and then blown up with dynamite. The construction of the buildings, which were practical and substantial, alone cost many hundreds of dollars. LeSaint, with his company, is in the Kings River canyon in the heart of the Sierras making a series of mountain stories. Hobart Bosworth, leading man with the Selig Company for the last two years, and formerly a director, has left the company to associate himself with Jack London, the novelist, in the production of a series of London's stories. London is now in Los Angeles preparing for the work. Bosworth will direct and the plan is that London himself will appear in the pictures.

A Nugget of Truth.

The Los Angeles Tribune, one of the morning dailies, has started a regular daily department devoted to photoplay news, which has a place alongside theatrical news. The Tribune was one of the first newspapers in Southern California to discover that information about the new art has real news value. It has also shown a marked spirit of friendliness for the motion picture industry and those who are engaged in it. The following editorial, which appeared in its columns this week, is illustrative of its attitude:

"THE PRETENDERS."

"For the sake of accuracy, as well as that of a profession as honorable as any other, it is fair to state that when a girl by gross misbehavior gets before the courts, and, incidentally, the camera, she is not a 'moving picture actress,' although it is her habit so to proclaim.

"Taking joyrides with a seller of tickets at the movies, or getting acquainted on the street with a chap who once knew a man who was acquainted with a moving picture actor, may be pleasing diversions, but they do not lead to professional engagements."

News Briefs.

The "rag dance" with which the Universal Company recently dedicated its big new stage, at the Hollywood studio, turned out to be such a great success that a second one was held and this attracted even a bigger crowd than the first. Finding that he had discovered a real method of entertainment for the members of the Universal organization, Manager Joseph Engle announced that until further notice the dances are to be regular Thursday night affairs. They are held not only for the benefit of Universal players and their friends, but for all who are engaged in the production of motion pictures in Los Angeles, no matter with what company. Universal rag nights have already won an established place among the social activities of the local photoplayers.

J. A. Crosby has finished the laboratory which has been installed in connection with his new studio at Court and North Hill Streets and the building is now in use. There are facilities for developing and fixing 50,000 feet of film a day and the printing machines have a capacity of 20,000 feet a day. The drying drums are large enough to carry 6,000 feet at a time. Mr. Crosby is gathering around himself a staff of recognized experts, such as Joseph Woods, the scenic artist; E. J. Atkinson, formerly with the Eastern Vitagraph and Pathe companies, and Harry Moraine, formerly with Leibler & Co.

Phillips Smalley, director of one of the Rex companies, has improved upon the exciting situation of an automobile racing with a train. In the picture "Just in Time," soon to be released, he added a racing motor boat to the other two elements and put a dynamite explosion at the end of the race.

E. H. White and Robert Wilson, both former newspaper men who have graduated into the picture game, have started for Central America with a motion camera in search of educational subjects, particularly along ethnological lines. The expedition is backed by James A. Crosby, the Los Angeles producer, who will release the films.

John Lloyd's novel, "The Invaders," has been produced as a two-reel motion picture subject by George H. Melford, of the Glendale Kalem company. The negative has just been shipped to New York.

Rather than use another train and run the risk of having sharp-eyed spectators spot the difference when the picture appeared on the screen, Director McGowan, of the Glendale Kalem organization, raced a Southern Pacific train fifteen miles over mountain roads and beat it to the next station with a margin in his favor that left time for the operator to make a set-up before the train came in sight. At that McGowan does not claim to be an expert auto driver. The speed test grew out of the circumstance that the story called for one scene with a train leaving a station and other scene with the same train arriving at a different station.

Tom Evans no longer insists on calling the place he manages "The Powers Photo Plays, Incorporated, Studio." To expect people to deliver a speech every time they referred to the place was unreasonable and, besides, they wouldn't do it, so now it is simply the "Monarch" studio.

William A. Pinkerton, head of the famous detective agency which bears his name, has been visiting in Los Angeles. While he was here the newspapers interviewed him and one of the things he talked about was the motion picture. "If you will eliminate the crime picture from the motion picture theaters, you have one of the greatest educational institutions in the country," he said. "They teach you concerning many places, things and conditions that you cannot see first hand. I am heartily in favor of the motion picture, but by all means eliminate the crime picture from the performances."

Robert Edson is the latest star of the legitimate drama to turn his attention to the possibilities of the film as a method of increasing his fame, his opportunities and his bank account. He has just purchased a home in Los Angeles as a preliminary to locating here and operating a producing company to feature himself.

For the information of the London correspondent who has heard a rumor that Constance Crawley, the famous Shakespearean actress, is about to appear in a series of motion picture productions, and who "gives the rumor for what it is worth," it may be said that Miss Crawley has been working in Los Angeles for six months and has appeared in no less than eight big productions under the Powers trade mark.

Lois Weber (Mrs. Phillips Smalley), co-director with her husband, of the Rex Company, and Mayor of Universal City, was the principal speaker before the Woman's City Club, of this city, July 14. She told the women about the making of motion pictures, a subject she knows.

Francis Newbury, formerly of the Santa Monica Kalem company, and Ethel Davis, lately with Kinemacolor, are new members of the Selig organization.

John Buss, a scenic artist in the employ of the Vitagraph company at Santa Monica, suffered a fracture of the skull in a wreck of an interurban train between Venica and Los Angeles. The shock made him delirious but not unconscious, and he wandered away from the scene of the wreck before the rescue work began. Two days later, still delirious, he appeared at the studio. He was unable to explain how he had passed the time meanwhile. He is still in the hospital.

BRITISH NOTES.

There seems to be just a reasonable possibility that moving picture scenario writing will develop into the newest fad of the leisured aristocracy in precisely the same manner that preceded the advent of the popular novel a decade or two ago. Already the Clarendon Company has produced scripts by the Marchioness Townshend. I have seen two of these myself and for films "boomed and puffed" to the extent that these were one would have expected something less mediocre. The Marchioness has now written another, "The Convent Gate," while I also hear that Lady Troubridge has successfully palmed off some plots on to the Clarendon Company.

Some time ago I described the invention of "life targets"—a screen for the reception of moving pictures to be shot at, and fitted with an electric device for recording bull-eyes. An enterprising firm have kinematographed the soldiers of the London Scottish on the attack and now the members of the famous corps are enjoying the sensation of shooting themselves. It is by no means improbable that the "life target" will be accorded official recognition for teaching recruits marksmanship. At industrial exhibitions in this country, as a source of revenue a "life target" is a little "gold mine."

Arthur Macklay, Essanay's familiar "Sheriff" has returned to has native country under romantic circumstances. He is only in London for a week or so and he has related to a professional colleague of the writer's the object of his mission. "Twenty-six years ago last month," says Mr. Macklay "I set out to tour the States with a fit up theatrical company. Shortly afterwards my parents died and I soon lost all touch with remaining relatives who regarded me as dead. But a year ago my sister and her husband happened to attend a picture show in Edinburgh where they recognized me in a film called 'Outwitting Papa.' They hurried to London to the film agency and saw me in another film, 'The Sheriff and His Man' and then they sent out a nephew to California to look for me. He persuaded me to come over and see them once more. And here I am" said Mr. Macklay triumphantly, "glad to see the old country again."

The first case on record in this country where an exhibitor has been summoned for showing an improper film occured last week at Darlington. Wm. Hy. Lancaster was summoned for showing a film entitled "Sapho" at the Alhambra. The police said that the film was suggestive throughout, but the magistrate on viewing the film agreed that such allegations were unfounded and dismissed the case. The same film had previously been banned at Leeds and Birkenhead.

Exchange Assets

An Interesting Symposium of Ideas on Exchange Management.

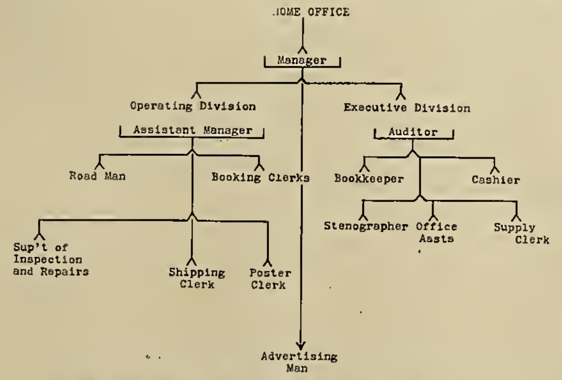
By H. Z. Levine.

"IF the problem of running a film exchange were merely confined to the effort of securing accounts, the difficulties of the exchange manager would be reduced by seventy-five per cent.," said J. R. Freuler, vice-president of the Mutual Film Corporation and owner of the Western Film Exchange of Milwaukee, when visited at his office in Milwaukee. "The big job after an account is landed is the intricate detail involved in keeping the account permanently on the books. Such intricate details as economic and scienefficiency, good will, advertising and other intangibles not only effect the tenure of an account, but effect also the total assets of the exchange. One standing annual account is a bigger asset than twelve accounts changed twelve times a year. While it is the aim of every alert manager to keep his exhibitors in line as long as possible—exerting every possible and practical means to do so—some exhibitors, naturally fickle, will discontinue a service on little provocation or dissatisfaction. The majority, however, rarely forget favors, however small they may be.

John R. Freuler,
Vice-president of the Mutual Film Corporation.

"Fundamentally, the manner in which co-relative and departmental lines are established, will effect negatively or positively the revenue of the exchange—this irrespective of the program. The program may be the best on the market, but if the exchange management and working system are inefficient and ineffective the exchange is likely to be a losing proposition. The importance of having "the right man" for manager cannot be too emphatically emphasized. Were the manager devoid of personality, good judgment of men and affairs, tact and experience, the exchange over which he would preside would show a weekly deficit. The job of exchange manager is not for the "small sized man." In our plan mapped out for the organization of our branches, we have divided an office in two separate divisions, the "operating" and "executive," with the manager as the directing head of both—and responsible for the heads of the different divisions and departments.

"When our branches were first organized, it was our plan to conduct a general advertising and publicity campaign from the home office in New York, and it was the duty of the exchange manager to conduct an advertising campaign as an auxiliary of the general campaign. As far as the small offices were concerned, this scheme got splendid results—but the managers of large offices in big cities with a multiplicity of duties were obliged by the very nature of things to neglect their advertising for more important affairs. Thus the general advertising campaign of the home office operated with little local auxiliary aid from the managers of the large offices and results as far as big offices concerned were ineffective. Our original scheme not working out to advantage and as good advertising is one of the invisible assets of an exchange, we were forced to take up the plan of giving every large exchange a special advertising man. However, this is still one of our unsettled problems."



A scientific management chart for Exchange management as drawn by H. E. Aitken, of New York, and J. R. Freuler, of Milwaukee, and put in operation by them in all of the large Mutual Offices that they organized.

Morgan, of Kansas City, who runs the Morgan Film Service, is not so much a believer in advertising, like Freuler and other fellow exchangemen, as he is in "good will" and "personality." That he practices what he believes is illustrated by a story the winsome Mrs. Morgan, his general assistant, tells: "John was brought up in the carnival and show business. Some twelve years ago he operated in Texas and the Southwest and was known by the sobriquet of 'Honest John,' and he is called by that name in Kansas City. His standing with exhibitors is our mainstay, now that our Universal service has been cancelled. This has resulted in the loss of but very few accounts. Some four or five years ago, John engaged one of his former carnival lieutenants, Marty Williams. Marty is an enthusiastic, open-faced Western type with a Catholic education in circus and carnival methods. A few days after he had been engaged, a man walked into Marty's office and confidentially imparted the information that he was about to equip a motion picture theater and he wanted to know just what he would need. Well-seasoned, as a catcher of suckers, Marty spread his net. He took a quick inventory of everything he had in the exchange and immediately proceeded to unload it on his catch. In the short space of half an hour, he had piled up on the counter one gross of carbons, one dozen condensers, five dozen advertising and announcement slides, ten reels and two rewinders. The shipping clerk had begun packing the stuff while Marty's ivory was showing from ear to ear. As he was footing the bill, John then walked by and casually asked where the big shipment was going and what it was for. Marty explained:

Jos. L. Marentette,
Consolidated Film Supply Co., Atlanta, Ga.

"What! You've got enough supplies there to last Mr. Jones a century. Here, put this back and this, and this, and that! All he wants is about a dozen carbons, a few announcement slides, a couple of reels and a rewinder." Marty looked at Morgan, first in pity, then in scorn. After the customer had gone, Mr. Morgan called Marty to the carpet and said: "Now Marty, forget those circus and carnival stunts. This show I've got here doesn't close Saturday night. We are here to stay!" Morgan has been identified with the film game in Kansas City for nearly a decade. At different periods he has used Licensed, Sales Company and Universal programs, and to-day, as he expresses it, he is running the largest "junk" exchange in the country and doing a big business. Is "good will" an asset? Morgan is the answer.

In this period of transition and materialism, while "good will" may be an asset in one locality, it will not be an asset in others. Where cold, calculating and money-mad showmen are concerned the all powerful and most convincing arguments are dollars and cents. In the South this is particularly true and an exhibitor usually takes a certain class of service not because he likes the exchange manager, but because the service is cheaper or conditions in his territory force him to do so. There isn't a more popular exchangeman in film circles than Joe Marentette, manager of the Consolidated Film & Supply Company of Atlanta. Joe attributes the success of his exchanges to their aggressive and enterprising methods rather than "good will" and popularity.

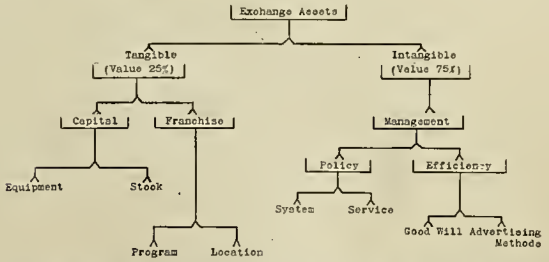
Joseph Snitzer,
Central Film Service, Indianapolis, Ind.

"In the South, comprising the nine States of South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas and Texas," said the irrepressible Joe, "there are, according to the last census, nearly nineteen million people. Almost two-thirds of this number are colored. Take a train from Baltimore and count the big towns you pass after leaving the State of Virginia! Come down to Atlanta and then cross the southern tier to Texas! Watch your cities! They are few and far between. The average town in the South supports three or four picture shows. The service naturally divides itself among the General, Universal and Mutual exchanges. With a twenty-two or twenty-eight reel program an exchange cannot give exclusive to more than one theater in such localities. The exhibitor has to take a certain class of service whether he likes it or not. If the service he prefers happens to be in the hands of a competitor, he has to wait until his competitor gets tired, then service is swopped. This is one of the big reasons why the trade can support three or more programs.

"In a few cities, however, competition among exchanges is much keener and popularity, aggressiveness and advertising is a business-getting combination and an asset."

In the old days exchanges were veritable mad-houses. It wasn't unusuual for exhibitors to enter the stock room and battle with the stock or booking clerk for a coveted subject. Often the aggressive exhibitor would attempt to pick his own subjects from the shelves or fight with another feverish "showman" for the possession of a popular film which the latter may have secured by greasing the palm of one of the exchange porters or office boys. There wasn't a room in the exchange that was free from invasion. Exhibitors would waltz in and out of every office searching desks, shelves, tables, under tables and chairs—indeed, they would sound the walls for invisible panels behind which some hidden treasure in the guise of a feature may have been secreted and reserved for a favorite.

A striking contrast to old-time, rough-and-tumble methods of booking film are the exact business practices of to-day. The "lay-out" of the Central Film Exchange of Indianapolis is typical of the up-to-date exchange equipment. Such equipment is really an asset. "The departmental lines in our organization are carefully and rigidly drawn," said the business-like and dignified Joseph Snitzer, manager of the Central of Indianapolis. "Every department has its distinct functions with a responsible department head in charge. While departments are physically separated from each other, our work is so systematized that the co-operation of departments is perfect. And because of our modern equipment we are able to get the highest average of efficiency—one of the most valuable assets of an exchange. Our almost perfect equipment and organization reduces to mere routine the handling of one hundred and fifty to two hundred accounts.



A chart showing a comparative valuation of exchange assets as originally drawn by Hopp and Plough, of Chicago, and revised by Freuler, of Milwaukee; Schmidt, of Buffalo; Drew and Blankmeyer, of Detroit; Marentette, of Atlanta; Lux, of Cincinnati; Bryson, of Minneapolis; Snitzer, of Indianapolis, and Nolan, of Denver.

"After perfecting a booking system, our inspection and rejuvenating departments were given close study. Our circuit system of booking takes some subjects out of the exchange for periods of twenty and thirty days before they come back. The natural wear and tear on film is great and with careful daily inspection and repair, the life of a film can be prolonged. But when a film is on circuit for an extended period and the sole care of the film is left to the tender mercies of the different operators, the natural life of a reel is reduced by half. Day after day film would come back from the circuit scratched, perforations, torn, with many breaks and bum patches. We repeatedly sent notes of caution and special letters with the film almost pleading for careful handling, but the damage to the film didn't stop. For a time we were non-plussed. We couldn't very well fix the blame on any one operator, as 'all operators claimed 'they got it that way' from the operator that ran the reel before them. After studying the problem, we concluded that the best solution would be to try to prevent damaged film from being further damaged. Investigation disclosed the fact that most scratches, torn perforations and breaks were caused by wrong patches or joins made by careless or ignorant operators. To teach all operators how to make a perfect manufacturer's join was the solution of the problem. We had cards of instructions printed illustrating the right and wrong way of making joins. You would be surprised how popular our method became—the operators co-operated with us willingly. I don't know of a single instance of an operator resenting our instructions because of a feeling that he knew it all and couldn't be taught. Whether a reel is an asset or a liability depends on its life, assuming, of course, that the subject is of the average. Indirectly, our assets were increased by increasing the life of our reels."

James V. Bryson,
Laemmle Film Service, Minneapolis, Minn.

Jas. V. Bryson, manager of the Laemmle Film Exchange of Minneapolis, is perhaps one of the most prolific advertisers in the rental business. Advertising methods he ranks above all other exchange assets. The forces of his organization are concentrated on advertising and every member of his staff has learned from their chief to understand and make the most of certain advertising values. When the Minnesota Exhibitors' League held their annual convention in Minneapolis this year, Bryson and his staff were on the job. While Mrs. Bryson entertained the wives of the visiting delegates and drove them around the beautiful Minneapolis Lake drives in her seven-passenger Packard, Bryson issued a daily newspaper of convention news and notes. In fact, the paper was such a force that the candidates it supported were elected to govern the league.

His methods of advertising have not only won for him a strong personal following, but it has given the Laemmle exchange almost one-half of the business in that location, while three other exchanges divide the remaining half. "In the show business," said Jim Bryson, "the success of an enterprise depends practically on the advertising. The same applies to the film game, which is only a branch of the show business. If advertising means the success of a show, then advertising should spell success for film. Only now do we realize that the secret of the instant success of the feature business was its advertising strength. When features of two, three and four reels were first put on the market, exhibitors were wild in their reception because it afforded them an unlimited opportunity of business-getting, theater-front display. Up to the time of feature releases the three and six-sheets were unheard of in the film business. Big and sensational paper filled a demand not until then gratified. It, at that time, didn't matter how good or bad the subject was so long as the paper was big and sensational. We were quick to take advantage of the new condition. Instead of permitting feature exchanges to get the big film offered (as other short-sighted exchangemen did), we bought the big features ourselves. We installed a feature department with special advertising facilities and the result is we have increased our assets within the last year almost one hundred per cent."

WHERE THE UNIVERSAL HOLDS FORTH.

F. H. Richardson.

On the morning of July 14, it was my pleasure, in company with Mr. Joseph Engle, of the Universal Film Mfg. Company, to inspect the Hollywood plant and Universal City. The plant at Hollywood and the plant at Universal City are situated five miles apart, and each one is entirely complete within itself.

The Hollywood plant is situated in Los Angeles proper, and is comprised of the general offices and other buildings necessary to the conduct of the business, as well as a great many out-of-door stages. The plant is substantial; the buildings are well made; there is nothing of the transitory about it. The whole thing suggests solidity, and speaks of the confidence the promoters of the Universal have in the future of their enterprise.

Distant five miles from the Hollywood plant is Universal City, and it is of this portion of the Universal plant I particularly desire to speak. The impression is very general that Universal City does not amount to much. That was my own idea, but I was most agreeably surprised to find that this view is an entirely mistaken one.

The site of Universal City was discovered by our old friend, Billy Swanson, and its marvelous adaptability to the production of moving pictures is a monument to the shrewdness and far-sighted wisdom of that astute gentleman. It is reached by a most charming drive through what is known as "The Canyon," which has served as a background for very many of the most beautiful western pictures turned out by the Universal Film Mfg. Company during the past few months.

The site of the city itself is a tolerably level plateau, forming the floor of a basin something like a mile in diameter entirely surrounded by very genuine mountains. The buildings are, of course, of a somewhat temporary construction, and to a large extent consist of prop structures of various kinds, such as store, hotel, residence fronts, etc., although there are also substantial buildings, such as the boarding house where the actors live, the cavalry quarters, and other necessary structures, but after all, the value of Universal City does not lie in its buildings, but in the fact that there is an enormous diversity of picture backgrounds, suitable to almost any kind of a moving picture you could imagine. Do you want a desert scene? All right, you can have it, for there is a waste of shifting sands large enough to be utilized as a representation of Sahara. Is it a jungle scene in South Africa you pine for? Well, I don't know where you would go, even in South Africa, to get a better one than Universal City can afford. Do you desire to lay a scene around a river, with canoes, etc., in active operation? All right. There is a little river runs through Universal City. Is it a mountain scene you wish? Very well, you will find all the mountains here you can possibly use in your business, and then quite some. In fact I was literally amazed at the diversity of scenery, and the marvelous adaptability of the site of the Universal City to the making of moving pictures.

The Universal Company here have real Indians, genuine wild animals, such as lions, tigers, etc., a herd of trained goats, trained horses, whole regiments of soldiers, cowboys, etc., an enormous assortment of costumes and an Arsenal which would not discredit one of the state armories. Any one who imagines that the Universal plants at Los Angeles are on the temporary order is entitled to several more guesses, because they are nothing of the sort. Aside from the plant, the value of the site of Universal City as a moving picture background is enormous, and I believe it will be used for this purpose for many years to come, if not permanently.

The employees of the Universal company in Hollywood and Universal City number well up into the hundreds. At Universal City the cowboys, cavalry, soldiers, etc., are paid a monthly wage, and are given board at the expense of the company.

In this connection, let me say a few words as to the utter foolishness of many of the merchants of Los Angeles. It is an undeniable fact that the moving picture industry has been of enormous benefit to that city, in more ways than one, yet it is also an undeniable fact that the merchants of Los Angeles lose no opportunity to "soak" the moving picture people by charging them, not only high prices, but in many instances enormous prices for the supplies furnished. This is a foolish and an exceedingly short-sighted policy. It is in a nature of an attempt—"to kill the Goose who lays the Golden Egg," and I would like to point out to the people of Los Angeles that the eggs cease to be after the goose is defunct.

I have to thank Mr. Engle for his courtesy and painstaking care in showing me over both plants. Mr. Engle took his departure for the East the day after I visited Universal City. His leaving was the cause for genuine regret among the Universal employees of Los Angeles, because Joe is recognized by those who know him as "Hail fellow Well Met," and one darned good chap. There was a very general expression of sorrow at his departure, and many were the wishes for his early return.

MUSIC FAKER WORKS PICTURE THEATERS.

Jerome H. Remick & Co., music publishers, advise the Moving Picture World that a party giving the name of Jack Wright has been working among the picture theaters of Michigan and adjoining states on the claim that he represents that company. His scheme is to take orders for two dollars for which he agrees to send professional copies of all the Remick publications for one year—three a week. The last report of Wright came from Eau Claire, Wis. Picture theater managers are warned to look out for this party and refuse to deal with him.

A FAN MAKES THREE THOUSAND MILE TRIP.

V. A. Kipp, of Loraine, Ohio, a screen admirer of J. Warren Kerrigan, the handsome Flying A star, visited Santa Barbara, Cal., especially to meet Mr. Kerrigan. Mr. Kipp presented Mr. Kerrigan with a very pretty pillow case on which was embroidered a "Flying A" with the initials "J. W. K." The gift was much appreciated.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Putting Up a Front.

FUNNY how some people look at things. Here is a letter from a feature film man that is used, not so much because it is a new point of view, as that it shows the ideas of so many nearsighted exhibitors. The correspondent writes:

> The other day an exhibitor was telling me of the difficulty he experienced in attracting patrons, no matter how good a subject he might be showing.
> I asked him if he ever tried any of the suggestions offered in your department. He said:
> "No, but Great Scott! WE know how to advertise; why we've had the hull front of the theater covered with paper, and still they won't come in."
> This man is located in one of the best residential sections. Can you beat this?

We don't know that we can beat it, but we can equal it in hundreds of cases. Almost any large town will still show one or more houses trying to attract two-dollar patrons with dime-museum methods and these are just the people who do not read this department because they know how to advertise.

Some persons gauge their advertising by the number of posters they buy. If they have a big attraction they plaster the entire front of their house with paper and then wonder why patrons do not come. We have seen house fronts in good sections so covered with stuff that decent people were actually afraid to enter. The fake dime museum and the cheap side show cover their fronts with banners to hide their deeds of darkness just as the fake clothing sale is carried on behind windows so blanked in with signs that the gas has to be lit. The wares offered could not stand the honest light of day, and the bigger and more attractive the side show banners, the smaller and more pitiful the number of attractions inside. All of this is so well known that wise people keep away.

There is still another reason why the best people keep away from the over advertised photoplay theater. They are apt to know that the man who is so ignorant that he does not know how to advertise is too ignorant to conduct his house properly.

Suit Your Clientele.

If you are catering to the people who used to support the dime museums, and if you are catering to these alone, it is all right to resort to dime museum-methods to advertise your performance, but if you have half a chance at the better class of patrons, offer a few seats at a slight advance in price and put your poster display in the nearby stores or on the billboards.

We know of one man who fought shy of the theaters near his home for three years. He liked to see the motion pictures in the vaudeville theaters he attended occasionally, but he had been taught by experience to regard the poster front as the advertisement of the fake and he kept away from the rather lurid fronts of the theaters close at hand. One night we called on him and suggested that we would like to show him the pictures. He was still so cautious that he would not take his family, but he found that the entertainment was pleasing and now he is a more or less regular patron and his wife and daughter attend almost daily. He was educated to his error, but there are thousands of persons who would go to a ten-cent theater with a clean and decent interior and a modest front who think that the theaters they pass daily must be cheap because they look cheap.

If you have a house in the slum district, perhaps an excess of paper will bring a little extra trade, but if you can draw the better class of patrons, do not suggest that you are running the sort of place that requires you to divide with the police in order to keep open. If you are running a theater, run it as a theater, advertise like a theater. If you want to run a "joint" or a "dump," get down where the dumps belong and do not bring discredit on your business.

A plentiful supply of paper will, in some instances, add to your business, but no matter where you are located, do not cherish the idea that you need thirty-three sheets with which to advertise three or four reels. You don't.

Stencil Stuff.

H. De Subers wrote the other day that he had something to say to exhibitors. What he had to say was that he would cut tag paper stencils for one scene a standing inch. In sending the information he added that he was not a professional sign man, but a showman looking for a connection. That belongs in the classified advertising department, but he sends some good instructions for stenciling, so it goes here. If you work stencils you may find these hints useful:

Shading with stencils.—To shade or shadow letters by means of stencils, make another pattern of the letter or letters to be used, and the shading drawn as it is intended to appear on the sign. Cut out the shading only, and when the faces of the letters are dry then stencil in your shading.

How to use them.—There are three ways of applying the color: With a brush, a roller, and with a pounce by pouncing (daubing, stamping) on the color. The first method is usually employed, but the latter does the neatest work. The brush is liable to bank the color on the edges of the letters, forcing it underneath, giving them a rough or ragged edge appearance. For brush work the paint should be mixed very stout, using oil enough to bind it, and thinning to a working consistency with turpentine japan. If color in oil is used only a little drier should be used to thin it. If in japan, use a little turpentine as a thinner. A rather stiff, flat varnish brush is the best, although there is a stencil brush sold. The broad part of this brush will cover more surface, and when the openings are narrow, it can be worked to advantage by turning it edgewise as convenient to do the work.

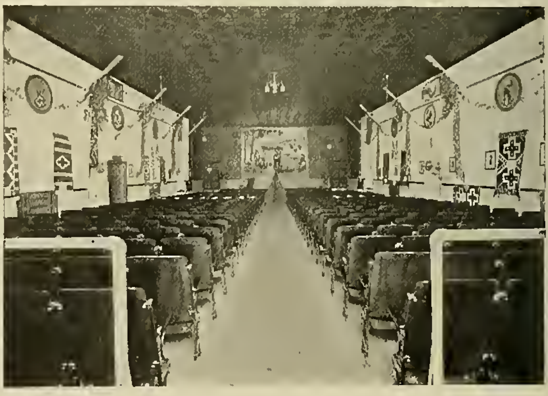
If a roller is used, cover it with material that will hold a large quantity of paint and not give it off too rapidly. Felt is the best material to cover the roller. The color should be mixed thinner than when using a brush, and the felt should be soaked full, then worked (rolled) on a board to remove the excess color before using on the stencil. If the color banks along the edges, it is too thin. In all work see that the edges of the stencil lie perfectly flat.

Stenciling with a pounce.—Give the surface to be stenciled a coat of varnish, thinned with turpentine (just tacky) sticky—just perceptible to the touch, lay on your stencil so it touches close to the sign, and pounce on your color, which should be tied up in a cotton rag in the form of a ball. Do not waste any time, or the varnish may dry and you may have trouble in removing the stencil. Peel the stencil off as soon as the pouncing is done, and clean it at once. The pouncing method is a superior method for stenciling with bronze colors.

Benzerr Ideas.

Ben Zerr, of the Schulkyl Theatre, Reading, made himself famous at the Motion Picture Exposition by giving out a barrel of pretzels as samples of the town's industry.

He believes in keeping things moving when he's home, too, and that is even more important. He had all sorts of cards and souvenirs as samples of the way he appeals to the young people and women. One card was used when he had an Indian lecture on some pictures. The cards were to be colored by the kiddies and small prizes were offered for those showing the best work. Of course, the cards went into the home and the advertisement went with them. Every holiday is marked by some postcard, a Liberty Bell for Independence Day, a pipe and shamrock card for St. Patrick's, and so on. We show a picture of his house decorated for the Indian stunt, the blankets and other matter being supplied by the performer. It made a good talking point to play up the educational feature and especial stress was laid upon the fact that the entire performance was given in the afternoon, and when he said it, he meant it and his patrons knew he meant it.



Up In Toronto.

George D. Perry, who runs the U-Kum Theater, Toronto, sends a chatty letter and some good advertising matter. He writes:

> Some time since I bothered you to pass your opinion on the advertising issued by this house. Previous efforts were well received and I trust the latest will have your endorsation. The sample marked No. 1 brought business; No. 2 was better and No. 3 I find is the best yet. While the cost is considerable, the returns are greater and a much better impression is created. These I put out from house to house once to twice a week in quantities of 1,500 to 2,500. I have also discarded the poster with some customers who were looking for the circus front and loved colors, but the seats thus vacated have been taken by the steadily growing automobile trade and by a class who never visited the picture show on account of its cheap appearance. I am enclosing a few samples of my lobby advertising and the photo enclosed will give you an idea of the general appearance. Two small frames on either side of the lobby are used to advertise "To-day's" programme, while one large frame in the center on either side. I use to advertise in advance my feature attractions—one for "Monday and Tuesday," the other for "Wednesday and Thursday."

The picture show business in Toronto is experiencing a "boom," every available plot of ground for miles around is taken up and almost daily we hear of a new one; at the present upward of thirty-five are under way, varying in size from 150 to 1,800 seats. The butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker are all getting in on the deal, and things are very unsettled. Some run as many as nine reels for 5c and many run 7 at the same rate. In one house on Saturday evening last, 22 reels were put on the machine from 7 to 11, and in another 4 were ground out in 40 minutes. The "Buzzer" is in use in the majority of operating rooms and the boss keeps his finger on the button.

I run five reels Licensed film and every night, regardless of crowd; it takes 1 hour, 35 minutes to 1 hour 40 minutes, but everybody sees it "right." Business has been rather quiet for the past month or so on account of the warm weather, but will take on new life shortly.

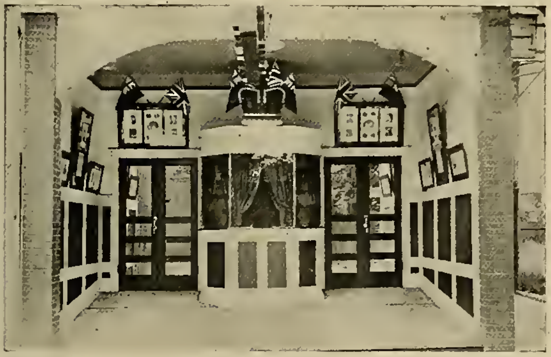
Among the houses under construction that will be a credit I might mention the one being built by Mr. W. L. Joy in West Toronto, which will have a seating capacity of about 1,800. D. Lochrie is soon to open the Park Theatre, another splendid house, seating 998. "The Aster," seating about 525, is another fine airy theatre, while several others of a smaller size will be most complete.

The days of the small house of 200 to 300 are numbered, and, while there are a number of such going up, the builders had better spend the money in farm lands from which the returns would be much greater.

Sometimes I am going to give you my impressions of the picture show business in Ontario, the regulations under which we are forced to do business and of the men who are really "doing things."

The Lesson.

We print a picture of the lobby as it is now. Note that the dropping of the posters was followed by some loss of patrons, but that others stepped in to take their places. The lobby is quiet and elegant in appearance, and none of the space is taken up by frames and easels. There are some houses and some localities where posters must be used plentifully to influence patronage, and because Mr. Perry does not use them, it does not follow that posters should be abolished. It all depends on the house and its location. Mr. Perry evidently appeals to the best class of patronage; those who resent the circusing of the front. He draws the bigger patronage by abolishing the poster and dropping that class of patron whom the poster most strongly attracts. Perhaps yours is a house with a poster patronage. If it is, it would be suicidal to drop the posters, but you can quickly tell from your audience whether you need to make a display like a circus or will do better to suggest the quiet elegance of a more pretentious house.



The Samples.

The samples sent indicate his three stages of house advertising. Number one is merely a single sheet printed up with the bill for the day. It is 3¾ by 10 and is printed on one side only, carrying two titles. The second is the natural development, a six pager with pages 4x9. This carries the bill for two changes and a little reading matter. The last is a four page folder with pages 4x5, carries two changes and the back page announces some coming feature. In the folder sent the first page is completely explanatory. It may help others to get all the facts in small compass. The text reads:

"THE U-KUM"
ON COLLEGE STREET AT DOVERCOURT
GEO. D. PERRY, - Lessee and Manager

An announcement of our feature photo plays for Monday and Tuesday (tonight and tomorrow night) and for Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Open 7 p. m. to 10.45 p. m. Program at 7:15 p. m. sharp. Come early.

Inside comment from THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD backs up the announcement of each feature. The slips are enclosed in a good grade envelope bearing the words, "An announcement from," and the card of the theatre.

Throughout the press work and typographical display are excellent and wholly in keeping with the class of patronage to which Mr. Perry caters. That seems to be the secret of his success. He runs his theatre to suit fastidious patrons and we think that he gets a more permanent clientele than the man who runs a theatre to suit himself and who slaps the reels through in a hurry when there is a crowd in front of the window.

You do not hear people object to the lightning speed at which film is run in the rush hour. You find it out only when it is too late to get many of them back. If you run a reel through in ten minutes you are swindling your patrons just as surely as though you put your hand in their pockets and stole their money, because you sell them something you do not deliver—a good show.

Mr. Perry uses a card about 10½ by 12. The coming attractions run the narrow way of their cards and the tonight is set the long way. These latter look so attractive that we reproduce one of the posters in reproduction. They are printed on marbleized paper slightly off the white in tint, and the border is in gold. We believe that Mr. Perry does his own printing.

TO-NIGHT'S PROGRAMME

THE LAW AND THE OUTLAW

A pleasing romance of the fast passing and picturesque west, interwoven with a series of astounding and death-defying feats of cowboy daring. It is a veritable Two Part triumph.

Open 7 p.m. to 10.45 p.m. Programme at 7.15 sharp.

You will forget your troubles and go home happy.

Programs.

Editor Smithers seems to be hedging. We take this from the last issue to hand:

> "Editor C. T. Smithers of the Idle Hour Educator, Aberdeen, S. D., comes out flat-footed in favor of votes for women in the last issue. We wonder how many windows the Idle Hour has."—Moving Picture World, July 19th.
> All our plate glass is safe, Brother Sargent, for the Aberdeen suffragettes are not the window smashing kind. But, nevertheless, it sometimes pays to be cautious.

The Cameraphone Bulletins have another writer, Dr. Stanley Davis, on their staff, making three special writers for their series of house publications. This comes pretty close to being a record in program work of any sort.

A new program is the weekly program of the Star and Elk theatres, Weiser, Idaho. It is not very ambitious yet, carrying no house matter other than brief descriptions of the programs and a third of a page advance stuff. It pays merchants to advertise in their program. It might pay them to take a little more of the space for themselves. Give the reader something more than the mere program to read and you'll have twice the argument with which to approach the outside advertiser.

On the News Stands.

The Rex Theatre, Buhl, Idaho, goes the rest one better with their Rex news, and offer it on all local news stands, the same as other publications. The paper is not for sale, but the novelty gets an effective distribution. Mr. Sergel writes:

> We have made arrangements with all the news dealers to carry the "News" on their stands, and this has attracted considerable attention. We have also placed it in all the barber shops. The waiting rooms in doctor's and dentist's offices have not been overlooked. Where can we procure short Biographies of licensed players? If the manufacturers would supply something of this kind it seems to us that it would prove interesting advertising. Our questions in the "Question Box" are all faked. We hope tho' that soon we will have some "really and truly" ones to answer. (They will E. W. S.) All our advance "dope" was destroyed recently and we are handicapped in writing up our program as we would like to and as it should be. However, missing copies of the "World" have been ordered and we hope for a decided improvement in our next issue.

We think that if Mr. Sergel will write to the press departments of the various licensed manufacturers they will supply him with the material needed. We know that H. A. D'Arcy, of the Lubin Company, has a set of sheets and we think that Mr. Spedon can supply these. Possibly, if he will write to the Advertising Department of the General Film Co., 200 Fifth Avenue, New York, he can get all the material he will need.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

The New Technique.

LAST week we announced that the second edition of Technique of the Photoplay would be ready for distribution August 15. It has been found possible to anticipate this date and the book is now ready. Please send your order to The Moving Picture World, 17 Madison Avenue, and not to this department or to the author. The book is published by the publishers of this paper and they have the distribution in control. To send to this writer at his personal address or in care of this department merely causes a delay of a day or two, since the order is turned over to the publisher.

We think that even the old-timer will appreciate the new edition. The first edition was written with full knowledge of the studio and its conditions and while fresh from the editorial desk. The facts are all there, but in the new edition a change in the treatment makes the facts more apparent. In the first place, there are 176 pages against 51, and this makes possible a more detailed treatment. In the second place—and this is more important—to a knowledge of the studio and its conditions, the new work has been planned in accordance with a more intimate knowledge of the difficulties that confront the beginner.

Whenever the house organs of the correspondence schools have wanted to get nasty, they have referred to the tremendous sums we are supposed to have made through our critical service. In the past two years there have come but three or four weeks when we would not have traded the week's receipts for a nice new ten dollar bill, but each week we have sat in with three or four beginners who wanted to be helped out of their troubles. We think that in many cases we have given help. We know that they have helped us in showing just what it is that troubles the beginner. In helping them to overcome their difficulties we have been better enabled to help others in a more general way through this department, and the new book is the result.

We think that the Nelson person is going to complain again because we do not teach dramatic construction, but we have not written the book to please Mr. Nelson. Dramatic construction is taught, but it is taught in non-technical terms. We have tried to keep every line of the book so simple that it can be understood without the aid of a dictionary, and we think that the information is none the less valuable because it is simple and intelligible. To quote Popular Mechanics, it is "written so you can understand it," and at the same time it covers the ground more thoroughly than the first edition. It is a teaching book and not a treatise: a real text book and not an essay.

Mrs. Breuil's Plans.

Replying to two persons who want to know what company Mrs. Breuil will connect herself with now that she has left the Vitagraph, the answer is that she is not seeking an editorial connection. She plans to engage in critical work and possibly later on will branch out along those lines. There should be a demand among the manufacturers for a consulting editor, but there has been no talk along those lines. For the present she will criticize manuscripts and write two-reel reproductions, probably under a first-run arrangement.

Not a Clearing House.

Marc Edmund Jones writes that the Photoplay Association of the Photoplay Magazine is not a clearing house scheme, but that it will hold to criticism at cost price as its inducement. Jones should know for he is running the scheme. He doesn't explain just what you get for your dollar you pay when you join, but, perhaps, that will come in another letter.

Jones is going to be stylish and winter in New Orleans.

Ears and Eyes.

Yesterday we handled four scripts. Three of them trusted entirely to the fact that the story read well. Scenes gave involved mental processes, but no action. In fiction form one of them would have been acceptable, but no one is going to read the script but the editor and the director. The others will only see it, so write in something to be seen. Here was one of the scenes from one play.

Room—Helen enters—sits on the bed—she has an idea—rises and exits.

Here is the action: Helen enters the room, sits on the bed, gets up and goes out again.

There is nothing to that to appeal to the intelligence through the eye. It can be hinted that Helen gets an idea, but we cannot tell whether she is going to kill John or merely remembered that she forgot to put the cat out for the night. If she is on her way to kill John, it promises to be interesting, after a fashion, but we are not interested in the cat.

When you write a scene write something to be seen. Do not write meaningless action and then explain what it means. The action will get on the screen, but the explanation will not, unless a director is willing to take more trouble with a script than is required these days.

Don't leave it to the director. Do it yourself and in no time at all you'll be able to write the action you see with your mind. Then you'll see before you write that the action is or is not explanatory and you'll be able to correct your mistakes.

Keep Away from Religion.

Frank A. Kramer, head of the Chicago Circle, sends a slip which he found pasted up in the Polish and Bohemian section of Chicago. It is a small slip which reads:

> I refuse to patronize any moving picture show using any priest, nun, church or religious subject whatever on its films.

Some companies have made the same ruling, but it is evident that there is a crusade on the part of some persons more or less actively connected with church matters that must eventually find reflection in the studios.

Begin now, if you have not already done so, to omit such matters from your scripts. Already some of the companies adhere to this rule and for a time it was almost universal, but lately there has been a growing tendency to use priests, nuns and religious ceremonials. Many times the employment of such factors is reverent and in perfect good taste, but not always, and the safest rule is to eliminate such matters entirely. From the Pope himself to the village priest, the Catholic Church has been friendly to the pictures, but that is all the more reason why their impressive ceremonials should not be dragged in to make a theatrical spectacle.

Song Writers.

"Get-rich-quick Photoplaywright" writes that our few remarks on swindling song publishers comes too late, as he has already sent his money to one of these concerns. If the writer using this signature will send his name and address and the facts in the case, including the literature, perhaps he can be helped to get his money back.

Advice.

Don't look to the manager of your local theatre as a mine of information on photoplay matters. It may be that he knows less than you. He likes to pose as an authority and, no doubt, he does the best he can by you, but for all that, the fact that he runs the theatre does not qualify him as an expert on production.

Only recently we had to straighten out a writer working along the wrong lines, because of well meant but utterly impossible advice given by a local exhibitor, and every editor is familiar with the letter that starts "Mr. Blank, of the dash theatre has advised me to send this to you, because it is just the sort you want," when it may be a million miles from the real thing.

If you want information ask us, and we'll reply through the Inquiry Department, with no charge to you, but remember that the man who runs a theatre may not know all about the production end just because he runs films. Some of the most impossible scripts are written by exhibitors, for that matter.

Making Good.

"How can I tell if I shall ever succeed?" is the gist of a letter too long to be published. It is the substance of many other inquiries and hundreds of unasked questions, and the answer seems to be that time alone will tell.

You may start in, sell half a dozen scripts right off the typewriter and then fail to sell any more. You may write for a year, sell none, and then commence to sell steadily. You cannot tell who will succeed any more than you can tell what will succeed. A story may be pronounced poor by ten editors and sell to the eleventh, and the man who cannot sell a single story may suddenly turn about and sell them in bunches.

Only lately a man who had sold three scripts in a year started in to sell five or six double reels a month. As a comedy writer he was pathetic. In single reels he was cramped. He found his medium in the double reel and now he is virtually working under contract. Two months ago he would have admitted himself a mild failure.

There are certain requisites that you must have, imagination, a sense of the dramatic, a sense of the unities and patience. With these you should find success, but none may say when that success should come. It lies more or less with you and your ability to grasp the idea that underlies the whole business. Find yourself and then find your specialty and you will be placed. You may be able to write plays and yet write the wrong sort of plays for months or years. You may find your forte the first thing. No one can tell whether you will succeed or fail. If you have the imagination to invent ideas, the sense of the dramatic to develop them, a sense of the unities to keep them plausible and the patience to persevere, you probably will succeed in time. That is the closest you can get to the answer.

Program Tips.

Julian Louis Lamothe, head of the New Orleans Circle, is running a photoplaywright department in the Spotlight, the house organ of the Fichtenberg enterprises. There is scarcely room for much material in each issue, as the short page is shared with the Marc Edmund Jones, who is doing answers to correspondents, but it helps to keep up interest in the work and in the New Orleans Circle.

Slow in St. Louis.

From St. Louis comes a note of regret that the photoplay writers are so slow. One of the old-time writers long since offered to found a circle and help others along, but the response has been small indeed. Here is what she writes:

> The successful writer you referred to is indeed successful, not only in the photoplay line, but in magazine and editorial writing as well, and his wife, who is also a writer, made just one attempt at photoplaywriting and sold her scenario to the first company to whom she sent it. How many can boast of a record like that? And their own success has not placed them on a lofty pinnacle so far above the lowly beginner that they cannot hold out the much needed helping hand. They are just as desirous of meeting the struggling, unsuccessful photoplaywright as the successful one and are ever ready to extend the good old-fashioned Southern hospitality to all comers. Can you not arouse the St. Louis writers to a proper appreciation of the fact that these

"Circles" and "Inquest Clubs" are very helpful to even the most successful? We would particularly like to meet the "Unsuccessful beginner." There must be many such as be in this city and we are very sure there are also many successful writers. Was it not a St. Louisan who won the prize in the Imp Scenario Contest a few years ago? Rouse them up for us.

Get busy and send your name in.

We are inclined to think that some people view with suspicion the motives of the founders of these circles, and seek to find the "sting." There is no sting. Even the old-timer likes to foregather with his kind and every decent writer is more than willing to help others even as he has been helped, if the approach is courteously made.

All last spring writers, such as Dr. Stockton and George Hennessy, sat in with the Inquest Club for the benefit of the newcomers, and they are going to do it next fall, though in the fall the writer whose idea of studying to write plays is to get acquainted with some director—and who looks on the Inquest Club as a means to that end is going to be dropped. It is the same idea out of town. Get busy in St. Louis and elsewhere.

Fasteners.

It should not be necessary to refer to the matter of paper fasteners again, but it seems to be, so here goes.

Take six or seven sheets of paper. Fasten them with any style of permanent clip. Rather awkward, isn't it? You have to turn the sheets back to each other and they rumble and muss up. Take off the paper clip. When you have read the top sheet put it at the bottom, and so on. When you are through you put the last sheet on the bottom and the first sheet is once more on top. If you had a loose clip you would merely replace it and the work would be done.

The editor has a heart. He tries to read your script without mussing it more than he can help, and so he has a hard time with the permanent fastener. Consciously or otherwise, he is irritated at the pains he must take, and this reacts against the script.

If there is anything worse than the script fastened with a permanent binder, it is the script fastened with two or more binders and this, in turn, is only a shade better than the script sewed or glued into book form.

If there is anything better than the script with the loose clip, it is the script with no clip at all.

A Funny One.

Here is a situation we cannot quite "get." A correspondent writes that a story was returned to him as "Too improbable." Later the story was sent the same studio again and accepted, though there had been no change in the editorial staff meantime.

It develops an odd situation, but when Mrs. Rubenstein ran the script department for the Lubin Company, one of the directors used to read the stories she discarded, because she could not seem to sense the style of stuff she wanted. She is no longer with Lubin, and they have about five photoplay sharps over there now, but perhaps a somewhat similar situation exists in some other studio. We wish the correspondent would give us the name of the company.

Finding Things Out.

R. C. Mason is finding things out. He writes:

> A very vivid lesson was taught me last week when I witnessed a terrible automobile accident in which one was killed and four seriously injured. A lesson should be applied to photoplays; to avoid, unless in case of necessity, all accidents, death scenes, etc. Many a person has been a witness to terrible tragedies which they wish to forget, but which are vividly recalled by seeing some photoplay.

And there's the answer. You see a terrible accident. Your nerve is shaken. In your dreams you see the tragedy. It oppresses your waking hours. You turn to the theatre for amusement. There comes on the screen some similar accident. Instead of amusement, you sustain a fresh shock. You leave the theatre to face a sleepless night.

The writer thinks only of his big scene and because he lacks the ability to invent "strength," with him, means horror. Only the tyro adheres to the horrible for his dramatic appeal. He may have sold a hundred plays, but if that is the best he can do with dramatic construction, he is a tyro still.

Don't remain a tyro. Search for the truly dramatic and you will find that it does not always mean death and that death is not always dramatic. Just the other day a man wrote us that he was going to write crime stories because they sold best. He was wrong. They do not sell best, but they are purchased where nothing better offers. Offer something better. Get it over as plainly as crime gets itself over and see what happens. Then be nice and write and thank us for the advice.

Another Experience Meeting.

Robert A. Donaldson writes:

> Have not sold another script yet. Have written several more; have had two returned, but they are on their way again. The other four are being held. One hasn't had time to be heard from, and the other two seem to be held, perhaps for consideration, beyond the usual time. I'll sell another yet. I know I am writing better stuff than I did two months ago, and I am going to keep on writing better stuff. I note so many people get sore when the first company they send it to returns their script, or perhaps the twentieth. They can't see why they can't sell their plays. I have always figured that when a script is sent back eight or ten times, there must be something the matter with it, and so I put it away, for looking over, and revision. I can't see that the editor is so down on me that he won't give me a chance. Perhaps we will soon hear of the "Editors and professional writers scenario Trust." None but first class writers wanted. If everyone could sit down and write and sell their first or their hundredth script, everyone had better quit business and start writing photoplays.

Of course he is writing better stuff than he did two months from now and he'll be writing better stuff in December than in August. No one ever learned to play the piano without practising. No one ever learned to run a typewriter without practise. How can you expect to learn to write scripts without practise? Mr. Donaldson doesn't waste his time kicking because he doesn't sell scripts. He spends the time practising and in due course he will sell. Practise and then practise and practise some more. In the end you'll sell.

The man who wants to buy success ready made from a correspondence school is never going to find success. Practice, backed by intelligence, is what counts. The greatest living pianist today is not on the concert stage, nor had he been these many years. In the time when he did play he was a vastly better player than Paderewski, but he loved leisure and he would not practise. He had made enough money to live on and he would not practise. He is brilliant, vastly clever and a master of technique, but you never see his name on the billboards simply because while he has intelligence and technique, he lacks practice. It is the same way with photoplay. It is practise and practise alone that counts.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

G. P.—Bud Duncan was the convict in "A Queer Elopement." In "Professional Jealousy" the basso, tenor and soprano were Donald McDonald, Eddie Lyons and Miss Evelyn Quick. "Her Son" was released. There has been no change in the management of the Biograph Company.

J. M. L.—Mr. Truesdell is out West, but a letter to the New York office will reach him. We are unable to name the Nestor player. They issue few of their casts now.

H.—The Kay-Bee Identifier hopes to have that name presently.

H. E.—We do not know the player to whom you refer, unless possibly you mean Miss May Buckley. Cannot you name some of the parts in which she appeared?

J. O.—Miss Anna Little was the daughter in "Past Redemption." The Answers Man does not know, officially, whether Miss Snow is married or not.

J. C.—If your play is not an actual reproduction of some historical event of importance, but merely is based on some minor incident from history, such as you cite, it is not necessary to give chapter and verse. If you wrote a story based on the battle of Bull Run, for instance, the fact that it was based on that battle would add to the importance of your play, but getting inspiration from minor happenings, it is not necessary to cite the authorities. We have repeatedly stated our belief that theft in the studio is a negligible quantity. The matter you quote is not sufficiently authoritative to require comment. It is not necessary to send the clipping along with the story it has suggested, so long as it is a clipping and not copyrighted matter.

E. B.—We cannot reply to Pathe questions. The company refuses names and there is not enough demand for an identifier. Miss Helen Holmes and Tom Forman had the parts in the Kalem you mention.

N. B. H.—In the "Crimson Stain," Jack Sibley was played by Frank Newberg and Cox by Bill Weston. Casa has not yet been identified. Charles Elder was Jabez Crow in "The Failure of Success.".

J. H. F.—In the "Banshee." J. B. Sherry was Dan, and Miss Pinky Thompson his wife. In "The Tell Tale Light," Roscoe Arbuckle was Tom.

R. F. K.—Miss Billie West was Alice in "The Sea Dog."

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

Purblind Foolishness.

ON my Western trip it was my pleasure and privilege to talk with many men in many cities, members of the various operators' unions. As a general proposition I have found these brothers to be progressive and ambitious for their organization and themselves. However, I have found one thing to criticize and I have found this thing to be present in the minds of a great many people, though not in all of them. They are opposed to the dissemination of knowledge of projection. With the single exception of Chicago, my reception has been cordial and even more than cordial in all of the cities I have visited. Nevertheless, in most instances, with the exception of San Francisco, in the course of conversation is has developed that the men or some of them, are either opposed to, or in doubt about, the advisability of the distribution of handbooks and the answering of questions through the Projection Department. I believe, however, I have succeeded in showing many that their views are narrow-minded and mistaken. As well might a man undertake to impede the tides of the ocean as to try to stop or even limit in any degree the spread of knowledge. Were I to cease tomorrow to publish my books and answer questions through the department; were I to die, it would be found that the work I am now doing would go forward. There might be a pause, a grating of the wheels for a little while, but the necessity always develops the man. Where there is a demand, that demand has been and always will be filled, and you can't possibly get away from that fact.

But let us look a litle more closely into the right and wrong of this proposition. If it is right to limit knowledge of projection and seek to prevent its spread, then it is right to limit knowledge in any direction and under those conditions, of course, all progress would immediately cease, and the world would immediately stand still. If it is right to limit the spread of knowledge as concerns projection, then it is also right to limit the spread of knowledge as concerns the production end of moving pictures and under those conditions, of course, the advancement of the business would immediately be halted, and no further progress would be made, and so analogies could be multiplied almost without number. But let us view the matter from a more intimate angle. Let us consider the small town man, and the instant we do this, anyone who is opposed to the projection department and the handbooks, must immediately admit that, from this angle, at least, his contentions are ridiculous.

In hundreds upon hundreds of the small towns, from 1,000 to 5,000 population, there are moving picture theatres which are doing an exceedingly meritorious work in supplying those little communities with practically the only form of amusement they have, as well as wielding an enormous influence along educational lines. It is a fact, which cannot be denied, that it would be the height of absurdity, and entirely ridiculous to suppose that these managers could employ operators at anything like the figure that we of the city consider a decent salary. It simply could not be done without a makeup, and the makeup on that proposition has not answered roll call as yet. The business is not there. These little show houses manage to exist, as I have before pointed out, where the man does his own operating, his wife perhaps plays the piano and sells tickets, and John or Mary, son or daughter, fills some other position. In this way the manager is enabled to keep the place open and eke out a living and, as I said, his work is of vast benefit to the community.

Now this man has absolutely no means, or any method of obtaining knowledge except through the Projection Department and handbooks, the possession of which he considers as second only to his bible. In fact, it was in a letter from a small town manager, working under exactly the conditions described, that the term "Operator's Bible" came to be applied to the handbook. Now the better show this man is enabled to put on, the greater will be the enjoyment of his audience, and those audiences, in the aggregate, run up into the millions every day. Would you, Mr. City Operator, to serve your imaginary selfish interest, take the responsibility of injuring and reducing the amusement of hundreds, if not thousands, of small communities all over this and other countries every day in the year? Do you think you are justified in seeking any such thing as that? Well, my boy, if you do, you can have 9,847 more guesses, and then you can go right on guessing for the balance of your natural life and you won't catch up with what you are entitled to.

But, as a matter of fact, this kind of opposition is piffle—pure and simple. If the operator has got to increase his salary by preventing or limiting perfection in projection, or the interchange of ideas as between the operator of this and other countries, then I am afraid he will have to continue to work for a low salary yet a while. If the Union has to exist through and by means of this kind of sand-bag tactics, then I am afraid that after many years of sympathy and active work in the cause of labor, I shall have to change my views and begin to oppose it. There is no danger of this, however, because the unions, except in perhaps a few isolated cases, are pursuing no such tactics, and any advancement made along that line is not a permanent advancement; it is not a good advancement; it is not an advancement founded on a sound basis, but one built on a foundation of the sandiest kind of sand.

The thing for the unions to do, as I have pointed out time, time, time and again, is to get into the game, just as the San Francisco union has done, and use every means available to increase the knowledge and improve the work of its own members. Every man who has read the Projection Department during the past three years is well aware of the fact that Richardson stands for better salaries, better operating rooms and better conditions in general. They are also well aware of the fact that I not only stand for, but I demand that the operator makes himself deserving of these improved conditions by studying his business and producing the goods in return for increasing salaries and improved conditions. The man who seeks a 40-a-week salary and expects to get that salary through sand-bag tactics, returning therefor $15-a-week service, is either a knave or a fool, or both. He may succeed for a time, but his success will not, as I have already stated, continue. I was in the labor movement, my brother, quite some time before some of you had taken up the burden of life; I was active in it for many years, and all I ever got or had out of it was grief. There is every temptation for me to drop your cause and cater to the manager, and let me tell you right now that if the projection department did that your game would not be anywhere near as easy as it is. But the Projection Department is not going to do that as long as I am its editor. However, it seems to me that I am entitled to your co-operation and support. It seems to me that I have the right to expect you to take a more enlightened, advanced, broad-minded view of things. You are not children; you have reasoning powers. Why not use them? Now, boys, let's cut out this foolishness and get down to business. You want better conditions. I am trying to help you to get them. Let us work together in peace and harmony, to the end that permanent progress be made and that the operators in the near future come into their own and be recognized as first-class, high-class mechanics who are well paid and respected.

Please do not misunderstand anything in the foregoing. Aside from Chicago, where I called at the office of the union and received discourteous treatment, my reception throughout the trip has been, as I said, most cordial, and the arguments we have had on the foregoing subjects have invariably been friendly. I received literally dozens of requests to stop and visit unions, but only a few of these could be complied with, owing to lack of time. I have now set these matters forth freely and frankly, and told you exactly what is in my mind, and way down in the bottom of your heart, my boy, you know I am right.

A Blind Man Enjoys the Movies.

Up in San Francisco, by the waters of Golden Gate, there is a very pretty story told which unfortunately is true. Almost every evening a big limousine car rolls down Market Street and comes to a halt in front of the Market Street Theater. An obsequious footman opens the door and from it a silvery-haired lady assists the halting steps of a man who feels his way carefully and depends on his companion's arm for guidance and support, for he is afflicted with that most terrible of catastrophes known to mankind—he is blind. The pair enters the Market Street Theater and, as the silent drama is flashed upon the screen, the devoted wife becomes his verbal vision, for she sets forth the story which his sightless eyes cannot see, and so perfect is her descriptive rendition of the play, that, if it be a comedy his face lights up with smiles, or if it be a tragedy he follows it through, apparently with as much enjoyment as do his more fortunate neighbors who can view the whole performance.

As the play continues, the wife leans over and whispers its story into his attentive ear and those who have overheard the telling of the play-story say that her descriptive powers are little short of marvelous. It is a fact that this man, who can see absolutely nothing, regularly attends the performance at the Market Street Theater and thoroughly enjoys the performance. He is wealthy, but, no doubt, would be more than glad to give all his worldly possessions for that which is possessed without money and without price, by even the lowly street sweeper, namely the ability to see; all of which proves there are some things in this world which even money cannot buy.

Likes the Handbook.

Brother Ben Kochman, Des Moines, Ia., writes:

> I have found the Handbook received some time ago, to be perfect in every respect. It certainly is a book that no operator should be without. We are still with the I. B. E. W., though we are waiting for the I. A. T. S. E. charter, which we applied for six months ago. Can you, or some of the brother operators, tell me the salaries operators receive in New York or Brooklyn?—meaning, of course, salaries for an I. A. T. S. E. man; also what are the general hours there? I trust I will see a reply in the next issue.

Strange as it may seem, we heartily agree with Brother Kochman as regards every operator needing one of the Handbooks. As to the New York wage scale, I would not care to answer that just now, as it is expected that a new schedule will be endorsed in the immediate future. The hours vary with the various houses, but no operator is expected to work more than an eight-hour shift. Conditions in New York and Brooklyn are essentially the same. I took the matter of your charter up with President Shay by mail after he had left for Seattle (he left a week ahead of me), and he now informs me that the charter has been granted.

A Remarkable Performance.

During my visit to Tacoma, I viewed the operating rooms of several of the theaters, and in the Lyric, Brother George Small, who has charge of the projection in that house, almost took my breath away by showing me a mercury arc rectifier in operation, the tube of which had been in constant service thirteen hours a day for three years. This is indeed a remarkable performance as a little figuring will show you. This tube has been in operation approximately 14,225 hours, and is still doing duty, producing excellent light. It does not seem possible, but Brother Small assured me that it is a fact, and the tube itself bears evidence of long service. Its anode bulbs are coated solid on the inside with carbon soot, or at least I suppose it was carbon soot, and it is a disreputable looking affair all over, but it is still delivering the goods.

Another remarkable scheme which is popular in Tacoma is the wiring of the arcs of two projectors in multiple. In most houses both machines are operated from one motor driven shaft, which has two clutches, one at either end. The lamps are, as I have said, wired in multiple and the changing from one machine to the other is something worth seeing, although it only takes about one second. The clutch shaft is located immediately under a narrow table attached to the front wall of the operating room between the machines where the operator sits, and the levers operating the same are attached to the under side of this table or shelf. When the time comes to change from one machine to the other, the operator slips one lever over, which starts one machine, and another lever over which stops the other machine, at the same time striking the arc on the dead machine; and there is the curious part of it, since the striking of the arc on that machine automatically puts out the other arc by robbing it of its current; therefore the moving of the two levers and striking the arc, all of which is done simultaneously, starts one machine and stops the other, puts out one lamp and starts the other—a rather effective and unique arrangement. The shaft and clutches are made by some man over in Seattle, and if I can get hold of the dope on it, I will give it a description, for it is indeed excellent.

And now, while I am about it, I will make note of another stunt Seattle and Tacoma operators are pulling off, viz:

Where the above arrangement is used, many of the operators have reversed the magazines on the right hand machine so that they never need go out from between the two projectors. To accomplish this they have only to take the magazine off, turning it upside down, removing the fire traps, closing the hole with a bit of metal, and re-installing them in the proper position. This brings the doors on the left hand side, and the threading is then done from the left hand side of the machine. Of course, with this arrangement the take-up is driven from the clutch shaft before mentioned.

Most Tacoma and Seattle operators have a piece of glass about 4 inches deep by 5 inches long hung in a frame some 3 inches away from the aperture. This shields their eyes from the glare of the spot. The frame containing the glass is suspended by heavy wire attached to the top of the machine, though I did not notice exactly to what it was fastened. This is an excellent scheme and one which, in a little different form, I advocated in my first handbook, but personally I prefer a piece of light green glass instead of the red and green. There is a considerable tendency among operators here to use large carbons, and I found that one Tacoma operator, Brother G. E. Manning, Financial Secretary-Treasurer of the Tacoma Union, who is operator at the Palace Theater, was using ⅞ cored and ⅝ cored on 45 Amperes D. C., through a rectifier. He was getting good light, but I am inclined to think that he loses considerable by using such a large carbon on that amperage.

My visit to Tacoma was made on the afternoon of July 4th, and on top of that there was some sort of jubilee celebration going on, so that all the people in the world were there and having the time of their dear young lives; and still piled on top of that it was drizzling rain in spurts. Taking all these various items into consideration, you may take it from me, the moving picture theaters were not losing any money. I think some of them laid a layer or two in on top of the regular audience. The Palace has a seating capacity of 268, and in three hours' time that afternoon it had 2000 paid admissions, and the manager was standing out in front singing "God Save the King," with tens and twenties sticking out of every pocket, and the biggest cigar he could find decorating the front of his face. (Thank Heaven, I will be 3000 miles away from there when he gets a chance to read this!) He asked me not to mention his name because he is only filling a manager's position temporarily, being himself an operator and a member of the Tacoma Union; but I am afraid that when the owner of that theater sees the coin Brother ——— is raking in, he will invest in a box of carpet tacks and nail the temporary manager's coat tails to the managerial chair for good.

A Common Fault.

One of the prime factors in the perfect projection of pictures, either moving or stereopticon, is an absolutely clear field. Without this, regardless of how perfect things may be in other directions, the projection cannot be said to be first class.

In my capacity of editor of this Department, very naturally I visit a great many theaters, and, while it is doubtless true that I am supersensitive in matters pertaining to projection of pictures, still there is one fault so almost universal with operators, that it cannot be charged to that, and is worth more than a passing notice. I refer to the shadow so often seen on the lower half of the picture or near its bottom. This shadow is almost universally present, occasionally at least, even with the best operators; and it is a thing which requires very close attention to avoid, especially where the manager is penurious in the matter of current consumption and demands good results from relatively small amperage, thus compelling the operator to carry a spot of the least possible area.

The position of the spot changes continually as the carbon is consumed, and this change is what brings about trouble, since, as the crater on the upper carbon recedes, due to the carbon being consumed, the spot on the gate moves downward, also, by reason of the increased length of the arc, the outer edges of the light are not so pure, so that unless the carbons are adjusted, the lowering of the spot at the aperture and the increased impurity of its outer circumference, quickly brings a shadow at the upper side of the aperture, which means, of course, the lower side of the picture on the screen.

The only means of avoiding this trouble is found in the constant, close attention of the operator, and the frequent feeding of his carbons. This I believe is one of the reasons why the operating room itself should be as dark as possible and the observation port be of sufficient size, so that the operator will have a free, unobstructed view of his picture, since, except on titles with white letters near the bottom, or on a screen on which there is some pure white object near the bottom, these shadows are somewhat hard to detect in their beginning. The audience, being closer to the screen, may perhaps be able to detect them; and, anyhow, when some white object comes up suddenly, the defect in the light is very obvious and can be plainly seen. The fault is, as I have already said, in greater or less degree almost universal, and it is a fault which should not be tolerated by the manager, or committed by the operator himself, but its entire elimination means, as I also have said, a comparatively dark operating room, an observation port of goodly size, and very close attention on the part of the operator.

The Mercury Arc Rectifier in China.

The Arcade Amusement Company, Tientsin, China, writes as follows:

> As I wrote you some time back we ordered from Mr. Hallberg a "Mercury Arc Rectifier" and received it lately. Everything arrived safe except a few minor parts, which I had made locally. The juice formerly cost us anything between $120 and $150 (Mexican) per month, but now it is hardly $30 and I was rejoicing over the saving for the past fortnight. The machine worked very satisfactorily indeed for a fortnight and then all of a sudden it broke down. There was an awful smell in the machine room and on examination it was found that smoke was issuing from the shaking magnet which was running hot. Luckily, when I installed the new rectifier, not being sure of its working satisfactorily I left the old resistances for use in case of any emergency. I had the old resistances connected up with only a five-minute delay of which the audience took no notice.
> I am using from 24 to 30 amperes, current taken from 220 volts, 50 cycle A. C. supply station. The breakdown was on the 30th evening, and after having taken out and cleaned the shaking magnet and coil of the water I poured on them the previous evening to cool, I tried the Rectifier again on the morning of the 31st for over half an hour and it worked without any hitch. When it was used at night the same trouble came again and I was obliged to go back to the resistances again. I am ordering a shaking magnet with the coil from Mr. Hallberg this day, but in order to prevent any future trouble, could you tell me what is the cause of this trouble and how to prevent it?
> Your Handbook was very useful in installing the Rectifier, but I find nothing about what to do in case of an emergency like this. Perhaps it might be useful to your readers if you will write in your departmental columns what are the parts of the Rectifier most likely to get out of order and what to do in case of an emergency. I think it is possible that my operator may have used more than 30 amperes and hence the trouble, but the operator says he had the ammeter always under 30, the maximum for which the Rectifier is made. It is quite possible that this may have been 33 instead of 30 as I find the ammeter fluctuates a good deal. It is rather very difficult to keep the meter at a certain reading. To keep it under 30 I am using a 110 volt Pathe resistance in connection with the ammeter. As soon as the arc is struck the meter is at 30 and in a few minutes it goes as low as 22 and keeps fluctuating between 22 and 30 all the time. Therefore, I think it possible it might have been 33 amperes or more that caused the trouble.

As to the Mercury Arc Rectifier trouble, I wrote the General Electric Company, Schenectady, N. Y., concerning the same, and they reply as follows:

> We regret to hear that Mr. Gyer has had trouble with his Rectifier, and would suggest that he try the series relay in starting the circuit and note whether the contacts open or not, as it is possible that the relay does not cut the shaking magnet out of circuit when the tube starts. We would further suggest that Mr. Gyer note whether the tube tips sufficiently to break the mercury bridge between the starting anode and cathode as the arc might flash back through the starting anode into the shaking magnet, thus burning it out.
> If Mr. Gyer finds that neither of the above suggestions remedies his trouble, we would suggest that he communicate with our organization direct and we will arrange something to give him satisfactory operation.

Unfortunately the General Electric Company is not very complete in its reply. I have returned the original letter to them with a request for further information, which will be published in due time.

A Few Calls.

During my stay in Seattle I had a most pleasant visit at the Seattle State Lighting Company's plant, where I met Miss Cuba Herbert, who promptly announced that she was the only and original hard working person of Seattle. Of course I also met some mere men, but they don't count. Miss Herbert sprung a new one. She said that a chap lugged in a Powers Six head one day and cheerfully demanded a "bobbin" for the same. It developed that it was an intermittent sprocket he longed for and his yearning soul was quickly satisfied.

I also made a most pleasant call on Mr. C. M. Simmons, Manager General Film Company, and his able assistant in charge of the machine department, Mr. P. Harrison. These gentlemen are live wires, both of them, and thoroughly up to date. They have a splendid plant, with 7,000 square feet of floor surface and everything is done decently and in order —also thoroughly.

I also had a most pleasant visit with the Moving Picture World representative in Seattle, Louis Goldsmith. Goldsmith is not Irish, exactly, but he's one darned good feller just the same and I am honored to count him as among my friends.

A Fine Theater.

During my stay in Seattle I paid a visit to the Colonial Theater, now in process of construction and nearing completion. This house will seat something more than 1,000 and contains several unique features. The auditorium is quite wide and the balcony is merely a narrow ledge some eight feet in width at the rear, not extending along the sides at all. Its entire space is consumed in a series of boxes, and these box seats will be, from every point of view, ideal. The pipe organ is unique in that the key board rests on a hydraulic lift, which, upon touching a button, raises to the stage level, carrying the keyboard and player with it. The player will be thus raised for solos, the organist occupying the "spot" while playing. Another thing is that while the main banks of pipes are at either side of the proscenium, there is a secondary set of "echo" pipes above the ceiling, entirely out of sight, behind a sounding board which will deflect the sound downward through a latticed opening in the ceiling. This feature is designed to puzzle the audience and keep them guessing as to the source of the music. The lighting system is also unique in one respect. In either wall are large, blind, or dummy windows in which are opalescent glasses covered by regular Venetian blinds. Behind the glass are twenty electric lights in each "window." I regretted very much that this was not yet finished as I would like to have seen it in operation. The operating room is spacious and has two pipes, each about 18 inches in diameter, through the roof, as well as an ample inlet, from the open air, near the floor. The equipment will consist of two Powers Sixes, a spotlight and dissolver. Projection will be in charge of Brothers Jay Harrington and J. W. Jiencke. The house will be managed by Mr. J. Hamrick, who is very proud of his beautiful new theater.

The East and the West.

On my trip through the West I was, on many occasions, asked this question: How does projection in the West compare with that in the East? This is not an easy thing to answer broadly. However, at least as between the extreme West and the East, I think I may fairly say there is a considerable difference, and that difference is in favor of the West. This, however, is but a logical conclusion; it is exactly as one would expect to find it, because in the far West operators' salaries are much higher than they are in the East, and, as I have long contended, this brings to the profession of operating a higher class, or grade of men. By this I mean a class of men who have had greater advantages, and possess a better training than does the lower priced man of the East. There are, of course, exceptions: I am only speaking in general. Some of the operators of the East compare with anything the West can show. However, I again repeat what I have often said in the past, that the higher the salary the better class of men it will attract.

In Chicago I took especial pains to visit, briefly, a good many theaters during the day and a half that I was there—paying my way in so that no one would know I was present. I did this because the charge has been repeatedly made that the union slide of Chicago Local Union No. 2 is very often followed by questionable results on the screen. I found this to be a fact in all too many instances, and in one or two instances the projection was very, very poor indeed, and in no way, shape, manner or form a credit to the union slide which preceded it.

One of the officials of the Chicago Union said to me that Chicgao was flooded with Handbooks, which were in the hands of non-union men. This was a queer statement to make. The presumption was that the union men were not buying the Handbook, which means, it seems to me, that the non-union men of Chicago were endeavoring to improve themselves and learn their business more thoroughly, whereas the Union men are assuming a self-satisfied pose and refusing to study. If I am wrong in this, I would be most happy to be set right, but that was what it sounded like to me, provided this official was stating the truth. However, I happen to know that a very considerable number of Chicago union men are the owners of Handbooks, so that I have really set forth the foregoing to show the silliness of the statement made by these union officials, rather than as actually setting forth the conditions in Chicago.

And right here I want to draw a comparison between two unions. In San Francisco there is a union of operators which has my highest admiration, because of the fact that, while a comparatively small body of men, they have built up splendid conditions for themselves, and have secured a wage scale second to none in the country; and by reason of the further fact that they are a live, progressive, broad minded body of men who believe that good projection should be found in any house where the union sign is displayed; and that their members must study and learn their business, so that their work will be a credit to the organization to which they belong. To this end they have established an apprenticeship system and a demonstration room; they have handbooks in their demonstration room, and many others are owned by the membership at large. They read and study the projection department, and let no opportunity escape them to improve their knowledge of their profession. On the other hand, let us take the Chicago local. Although they are much larger than the San Francisco local, and although they have an easier proposition to buck—San Francisco being one of the dumping grounds of the East, is constantly flooded with a large number of traveling operators, which brings the percentage of unemployed men in San Francisco much higher than in Chicago—still the Chicago men have a far lower wage scale than have the boys in San Francisco; and as to the excellence of projection in San Francisco and Chicago, there is literally no comparison. This is, in my humble opinion, due to a considerable extent to the fact that the course of the Chicago local is the exact opposite of the course of the San Francisco local. The Chicago local is, according to the statement of some of its officials made in my hearing, opposed to the dissemination of knowledge; it is opposed to the answering of questions in this department; to the sale of books of instruction, and seems to be opposed to about everything one can readily think of. Judging from the arguments of some of the officials of the Chicago union, that local ought to have existed in the stone age, because in that day men were not supposed to, and were perfectly satisfied not to know anything.

I presume Chicago won't like this little spanking, but everyone who is aware of conditions will know it is coming to them, good and plenty, and has been for a long time. When Chicago men undertake to stop the wheels of progress and oppose the spread of knowledge, they are biting off more than any body of men on the face of the earth can chew, and the sooner they realize the fact the better for all concerned. I have a good many friends in the Chicago local, as well as in the San Francisco local. I am not drawing this comparison because I have any feeling whatever in the matter, but because the statements of these officials of the Chicago union have called it forth. In this day and age, that man, or that body of men that undertakes to impede or obstruct the wheels of progress is acting a losing part and will never make much permanent progress. I prophesy right now that there is just one way the Chicago local can build up and complete a lasting and truly effective union and that is by doing as the San Francisco local is doing, viz: insisting upon its members perfecting themselves in their craft to such an extent that they can, when given proper equipment, produce perfect results on the screen—not sometimes, but all the time. Given this and a good, conservatively managed organization, the union man has nothing whatever to fear from the unorganized man, but without ability to produce excellence, the union man has to depend entirely upon the strength of his organization to maintain him, since he cannot advance any argument of superior, or perhaps even equal ability to his unorganized competitor.

Nice Operating Room.

During my recent visit to Chicago I examined the operating room of the new Kedzie Annex Theater, Madison street, near Kedzie. Mr. Sydney Smith, long with the George K. Spoor Company, is manager of this house, and Brother E. J. Halladay is in charge of projection. Mr. Smith assured me that the operating room was a model. It was an excellent room, but not quite that. The room is far in advance of most rooms and really would be a model were the wall shutters arranged to close automatically instantly in case of fire and were the observation ports of most ample dimensions. These are the two weak points, particularly the latter. The room itself is ample in dimensions and has a splendid vent flue through the roof, as well as window in the front wall, opening directly to the outer air. The walls are of some kind of flat tile, set side by side in plaster, until a thickness of probably eight inches is had. The ceiling is high. One end of the main room is partitioned off and this space is again divided, all with fireproof walls, and in one of these small rooms are two fifty ampere G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifiers, one for each projector, each being provided with an ammeter located on the wall of the main room. The other small room is for rewinding. The room is otherwise so excellent that it is a pity its observation holes are too small for that makes for poor results on the screen—or at least to some extent injures the projection. It is utterly useless to say it does not, friend Smith, for the fact is that it does, and facts are exceedingly stubborn things. I would not have mentioned these weak points in so fine a room otherwise, but for the fact that neighbor Smith claimed it to be a model. I cannot allow him to get away with that, except it indeed be a perfect room from every point of view.

Portland, Oregon.

From Seattle, Washington, to San Francisco, California, is a trip of 958 miles, but there was a break of one and one-half hours at Portland, and, having advance information of my coming, Brother E. V. Copp met me at the depot with a taxi and we made the most of the time at our disposal, though only one theater, the beautiful new "Columbia," was visited. This house was only opened in June this year, and it surely is a credit to the city. The main auditorium is spacious and is beautifully decorated. The theater is thoroughly up to date in its appointments. The operating room, save for its observation ports being too narrow, a matter which Manager Berguer intends to have remedied promptly, could hardly be criticised. The vent flue extends through the roof and is three or four feet in diameter. The equipment consists of two motor driven Powers 6 A's. A projector and a dissolver, all having the legs of their stands firmly embedded in the cement floor. The light is brilliant and the picture steady. Projection is in charge of Brothers E. V. Copp and F. E. Beier. The house is managed by Mr. O. T. Berguer, whom I can personally testify to as being a most pleasant gentleman as well as live manager, who not only knows how to stage the silent drama but does not expect his operators to produce results without things to produce them with. He tells Brothers Copp and Beier to get whatever they need, and then to produce results, and not excuses, in which he is absolutely right. I deeply regretted my enforced short stay in Portland, particularly when I learned there were close to 109 moving picture theaters in the little city, and that a large percentage of the operators are outside of the organization. Get in, gentlemen, is my advice and stand not on the order of doing it.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"THE SPRINGTIME OF LIFE" (Patheplay), August 1.—This fine three-part picture is notable not only for its good story, fine settings and excellent acting, but for the quality of its photography and its light effects. The latter factor is of so pronounced a value that it will be noticed by those who usually give little heed to anything but the story and its working out. The picture also is valuable as furnishing another answer to the question: Why multiple reels? It comes on a day when the regular program of the licensed companies is weak and colorless; it provides real entertainment. No one will deny that in a company producing single and multiple-reel pictures the standard of quality of the latter is higher. In "The Springtime of Life" there is a well-staged theater fire.

"THE NEW GOWN" (Lubin), August 1.—The story is a variant of the old theme of the husband who likes to spend some of the family income and not abdicate entirely in favor of an extravagant wife. Other things being equal, the story wherein is pictured well-to-do persons and their surroundings gets over more easily than does one of those in humbler circumstances—of the latter we have so many with us. Harry Meyer and Ethel Clayton have the leads in a well-acted drama, in which at the finish there is a bit of a punch.

"THE COURAGE OF THE COMMONPLACE" (Vitagraph), August 1.—Mary Charleson herein portrays the elder daughter of a farmer. She is the family drudge, with aspirations for an education. She saves money to pay a year's tuition in the School of Arts and Sciences, missions of life of which she sees in day dreams. The illness and passing out of a farm horse—old Dobbin was a good actor, too—changes things. Her money goes for the purchase of a horse. Author Wing had the courage of his convictions, and left the girl still the same old drudge. There is nothing in particular to recommend the story as entertainment.

"THE RED OLD HILLS OF GEORGIA" (Edison), August 1.—Produced by the company under Charles M. Seay, which recently visited Georgia. The backgrounds are primitive. The story seems at no time to get a real grip on the interest. It bears earmarks of having been turned out to fit the aforementioned backgrounds.

"THROUGH ANOTHER MAN'S EYES" (Selig), August 1.—Not a pleasant story. It deals with a young man addicted to liquor; he becomes a drunkard and later a felon. After serving time he returns to his home and, looking through a window, sees his old-time sweetheart married to the worthy man she should have married. A sub-title indicates "How bitter a thing it is to look into happiness through another man's eyes."

"SUCH IS LIFE" (Essanay), August 1.—A slight comedy about an economizing husband and an extravagant wife.

"HIS WIFE'S FRIENDS" (Essanay), August 1.—On the same reel as the foregoing is a short comedy by the same people. Mr. Carson buys tickets to take Mrs. Carson to the theater. The latter says she cannot go, as she has invited the Keots to dinner. The tickets are therefore given to Mrs. Smith, who in turn gives them to Mrs. Kent. The Kents go to the show. It is rather late when the Carsons learn what happened.

"HOODOOED ON HIS WEDDING DAY" (Kalem), August 1.—Showing how a little thing like suspected smallpox can upset plans for the wedding of a girl who has but three days to get married or lose a fortune. The most striking features of this comedy is Ruth Roland's up-to-date skirt, which is sure to make a hit.

"THE WONDERS OF THE BRINY DEEP" (Kalem), August 1.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this short visit to an aquarium, where we see some strange fish.

"A STUDY OF BIRD LIFE" (Patheplay), August 1.—Some interesting pictures of birds taken in their haunts. One is of twin owls that is especially striking. There is another of a kingfisher with a fish in his bill.

"MONTE CARLO, MONACO" (Patheplay), August 1.—On the same reel as the foregoing is this fine view of the famous resort.

"THE FORTUNE HUNTERS OF HICKSVILLE" (Vitagraph), August 4.—A little farce made by Robert Thornby and his company from the script of Hanson Durham. Its rural characters are fairly done, but the plot is slight and lacking in freshness. As an offering, it should be acceptable. The photography is clear.

"THE CELESTIAL REPUBLIC" (Vitagraph), August 4.—The camera man who took this offering, which is on the same reel, shows that he was really interested in what he was doing and not merely turning the crank to use up film. It gives us some Chinese visits that are full of human interest and will please. The photography is very good.

"WHEN LOVE FORGIVES" (Biograph), August 2.—A slight melodramatic plot that is not powerfully convincing. It shows how a girl finds that her lover is about to commit a crime and how she saves him from his weaker nature. Then she forgives him. It is not inspiring; but it is undeniably well acted. There is no drag to it either, and the photographs are clear.

"THE MONUMENT" (Biograph), August 4.—A short offering that, with the other picture noticed above, fills a full reel. It was not carefully produced; but there is a touch of sentiment that "gets over" and this makes it worth while. We refer to the boy's cutting with his jack-knife on the wooden slab over his mother's grave a touching epitaph.

"THE ROBBERS" (Edison), August 2.—A picture of the famous play written by Schiller in extreme youth; there is no need to comment on its scenario at this time, except that it is no better than that of the day's average offering. The adapter has done his work commendably, except that there might have been one or two more subtiles. The costumes are accurate and the staging, though rather Italian than German, is sumptuous. The chief value of it, as an offering, comes from the fact that it is a picture of a classical play, seldom or never seen now, but often talked of and lectured on. The Edison Company has done a service in making this particular film and the exhibitor should profit by showing it. The direction was by Walter Edwin. The acting is of fair quality.

"THE TENDERFOOT SHERIFF" (Essanay), August 2.—There is a touch of burlesque in this Western sheriff picture which ought to help it with audiences. Those who sat near us seemed to like it. It features G. M. Anderson in the role of tenderfoot, who is made sheriff when no cowboy will take the job.

"THE MESSAGE OF THE ROSE" (Lubin), August 2.—A melodrama like many others we have had, with Senorita and the rivals for her love. It was produced and acted gracefully and will interest a good many. The photography is clear. Its producer is Wilbert Melville. Dollie Larkin plays the girl; Joseph Holland, the lover, and Henry King, the rival.

"WHERE CLOUDS AND MOUNTAINS MEET" (Patheplay), August 2.—A picture that is most impressive and grand. We have seen several attempts at picturing the Yosemite Valley, but we have never seen any that looked so like a true success. The man who took these pictures really felt some of the grandeur around him and, strange to say, the pictures that he chose make us also feel it with him. The clear, effective photography helps of course. A very desirable release.

"COLUMBO, CAPITAL OF CEYLON" (Patheplay), August 2.—A few fairly interesting scenes fairly well photographed. It interests and instructs.

"THE WIDOW'S KIDS" (Biograph), August 4.—A picture with some lively youngsters in it. The plot is lacking in freshness and can be seen through at the start. It made some laughter.

"CUPID AND THE COOK" (Biograph), August 4.—There is more freshness and more fun in this than in the former one on the same reel. The opening scene will make a laugh at once, and the story, though too unbelievable even for a farce, amuses, because it keeps moving and keeps ridiculous.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 38" (August 4).—The topical this week has some very clearly photographed views of the races at Kiel recently—some fine pictures of sail boats under canvas in a stiff breeze. The other items are of fresh news interest.

"A VIRGINIA FEUD" (Kalem), August 2.—There is much to commend, even to admire in this offering; for, while the story seems hurriedly prepared, it has been very carefully and imaginatively produced. The human characters convince with power, except toward the end, where they become plot-ridden and unlikely and, the worst of it is, the plot gave plenty of natural possibilities, if the author had cared to seek for them. It was not natural nor necessary to make the bridegroom take his wounded sister home to the empty cabin rather than to the house of his sweetheart, where all the folks were—his and hers. Then the mind notices a lack in not finding a minister at the girl's house to do the marrying. As the plot now is, it would have been awkward to have had one there, but one might have been used to good advantage in a more natural plot. Would it not have been like life to have had the old man, since the bridegroom was lingering, slip out with his gun to see why? Then the younger brother might have caught a glimpse of him just before the little sister approached; might have had some reason to fire into the bushes. The people at the girl's house would have heard the shot and been full of consternation. The bridegroom and the old man would have heard the shot and would have crept near to see cautiously. The boy, thinking that he had killed his sister, would have slipped away as soon as he saw his brother coming, and the bridegroom and the old man would have met at the unconscious girl. This situation would certainly be dramatically effective and it would not be hard to develop it further. As an offering, the picture is good. It is splendidly acted by every one in it. The producer deserves great credit. It is clearly photographed.

"THE INTRUDER" (Vitagraph), August 2.—This is the weakest two-reel Vitagraph we remember. It is a love story set in American village life, but modeled after stories of English village life, so has a different atmosphere from its sub-titles. Its worst fault is lack of romance and this is chiefly due to an unhappy choice of a leading woman. Mary Charleson is a "character" actress and, in this picture, she killed all romance by touches of "character" work. Then there are incidents lacking common sense. We can see why the Vitagraph people used it; there are some good characters in it, but it was carelessly edited and unimaginatively produced. The author is George Cameron. One scene, the inn dining room, is excellent, with Charles Eldridge as the landlord.

"THE SUBSTITUTE STENOGRAPHER" (Edison), August 4.—A detective story that is not so good as the recent one in this series called, "On the Broad Stairway." It features the same woman detective (Laura Sawyer), but the story is rather thin and has little suspence or dramatic feeling. It is well acted. The producer is Walter Edwin.

"THE DEVIL AND TOM WALKER" (Selig), August 4.—This picture will probably interest a good many; for, while the devil fails to "get over" at all, or to seem like anything but an actor, we were kept interested in the face of Tom after he has sold his soul for gold. Perhaps this is because of its bold and rather bare simplicity. Hardee Kirkland produced it from Edward McWade's script. Harry Lonsdale plays Tom, and William Stowell the devil. The photography is clear, but not artistic.

"THE GRANITE DELLS, ARIZONA" (Selig), August 4.—On the same reel is this picture of curious rocks and grotesquely-formed boulders. It will interest mildly.

"INTEMPERANCE" (Kalem), August 4.—A melodrama rather than a preachment, for its sensational ending keeps it from being at all effective as a picture of life. The plot is clear, but is plainly conventional and follows suggestions found in other offerings that we have seen. The players do well. It is clearly photographed and can be commended as a clear offering.

"THE GOVERNOR" (Lubin), August 4.—The opening situation of this picture interested us greatly, but, in its development, we found several things that lack common sense, are not at all convincing, and mar the effect of it as a whole. In the first place, to make the girl herself send a bribe didn't help the drama much, for we practically knew that the Governor wouldn't accept it. It is hardly convincing; she knows the financiers are going to bribe him, too. This is a picture of surprises and it really gives one surprise away. There are other theatrical expedients that make it artificial. Yet it has much that keeps it entertaining. The playing of Francis Carlyle, as the Governor, is worthy and is well supported by Maidel Turner, as the girl, and others. There are many fine sets which have all been beautifully photographed. It was produced by L. B. Carleton from the script of Emmett Campbell Hall.

"GETTING MARRIED" (Lubin), August 5.—A young sport is notified by his wealthy uncle that he must be married by a certain date. The young man forgets about it until at a ball one night he gets a wire from uncle asking if he is married, and saying he will be there presently. In desperation the youth asks some lady there to volunteer to pose as his wife, as his time will expire in thirty minutes. Uncle's young wife, who has never met the nephew, volunteers to play the part. When uncle arrives and is introduced to his own wife as that of his nephew, the situation is funny. Having ten minutes left, and there being a parson present, the nephew induces a girl, on whom he has been sweet for some time, to make up her mind quickly, which she does. The principal merit of the picture is in the story. Pete Lang plays the uncle. Photography good.

"ROSES FOR ROSIE" (Lubin), August 5.—On the same reel with the above. Jack has a rival for the hand of Rosie. He stops to get a pair of trousers at the presser's and then buys a box of roses and orders them sent to Rosie. He leaves the trousers at the florist's and walks off with a box of flowers addressed to an old maid's sewing circle. At home he discovers his mistake, but thinks the trousers have been sent to Rosie. He makes frantic efforts to have the delivery stopped and has a pleasant shock to find Rosie with the flowers. What the old maid did to the florist was plenty. A snappy little comedy.

"A FAITHFUL SERVANT" (Vitagraph), August 5.—This picture is one of those done by the Vitagraph Globe Trotters. The scenes were taken in Venice. Pietro, a police spy (James Young) desires to marry Nina (Clara Kimball Young) daughter of Beppo, a cobbler (Wm. V. Ranous). Nina loves Count Guilio (Maurice Costello), her father's landlord, and her love is returned. Pietro, under false colors of friendship, gets the Count to take him to a secret meeting of socialists. The count makes an incendiary speech and Pietro reports him to the police, and Guilio is ordered banished, but hides away. Pietro then demands Nina's hand from Beppo and when the old man refuses he has him put in prison for refusing to reveal Guilio's whereabouts. Nina makes a living selling flowers for three years, after which time there is a change of administration and the fugitive and prisoner are pardoned. The story is well told, considering the difficulties of making such a picture in a foreign country. There are several mob scenes, acted by Italians, that are well handled, as well as some bits between native characters and principals. The results of the scenes are remarkably smooth when one realizes that two languages were used in most of them. As a picture it is well able to hold its own in a program of others taken under more favorable circumstances.

"DOLLY VARDEN" (Edison), August 5.—A story taken from Dickens' "Barnaby Rudge." A costume comedy of considerable charm and artistic nicety. Dolly (Mabel Trunnelle) is loved by Joe Willets (Willie Secor); but she is frivolous and ridicules him, so Joe enlists in the King's army and goes away to the American Revolution, where he loses an arm. Five years later he returns at the time of the "No Popery" riots. The rioters try to force Gabriel Varden (Robert Brower), a locksmith, Dolly's father, to make a key to the prison, but Joe rescues him. Simon, a rejected suitor (Barry O'Moore), meanwhile lures Dolly to the cellar of the Bull's Head Tavern. Joe and Gabriel, with a crew, rescue her, after which she admits she has always loved Joe. The principal virtue of the picture lies in the way it is done. As a story it is not wonderful, but the handling makes it very acceptable.

"THE LOVE LETTER" (Patheplay), August 5.—Max Linder plays the comedy lead in this picture. He flirts with a girl in the park and follows her home. She drops him a note from the window, but it blows into another house. He pretends to be a gas inspector and enters. Meanwhile a poodle has jumped out the window with the note. A man in the next flat is roaring about the size of his gas bill and the janitor tells him the inspector is in the house. Max is summoned to inspect a leaky meter. To get out of the scrape he reduces the man's gas bill. Max goes back to look for the letter in the first flat and sees the dog with the letter through the window. He gets it but finds it is written in a foreign Arabic. He goes to a translator. There is a laugh among the girls there because the letter is from a married woman who begs him to cease his attentions. Max retires in a sheepish manner. It is a typical Max comedy done in his well-known clever way, and therefore good.

"A MANSION OF MISERY" (Selig), August 5.—Wilbur North (H. A. Livingston), an Annapolis cadet, rescues Marjorie (Kathlyn Williams) from the surf. He calls at her home that evening and they stroll. They also exchange photos. Four years later Marjorie marries Prince Lorenzo (Al. Ernest Garcia) to satisfy her mother's social ambition, but she still loves Wilbur. Marjorie and Wilbur next meet at a naval reception in Italy. Both are unhappy. In a secluded nook they pour out their sympathy for each other, which is observed by Prince Orloff (Henry W. Otto), friend of Prince Lorenzo. Orloff notifies Lorenzo, who goes to take a look, but finds Wilbur making love to Marjorie's sister. This results in a duel between Orloff and Lorenzo, in which Lorenzo is killed. The wisdom of depicting Prince Lorenzo as a manly Italian nobleman raises the production out of the rut of cheap melodrama. Mr. Lem B. Parker, the author and producer of the picture, is to be congratulated for his persistent efforts in showing the full figure on the screen, instead of cutting everybody off at the knees. The action is just as plain, and he gets the full benefit of his beautiful scenic selections. There isn't much use for beautiful settings if close up acting obscures them all. The story is not altogether clear in spots. There is confusion as to the identity of the two princes, and the sister of Marjorie. The photography unfortunately is dark. The light seems to be from the wrong direction and throws the faces into their own shade. This kills expression. We mention it lest someone be inclined to blame Mr. Parker's use of the full length figure for the lack of facial expression. The story is good and there is fine composition in many of the scenes.

"HOMESPUN" (Essanay), August 5.—Grant Price (Richard Travers) and his fashionable young wife (Ruth Stonehouse) become estranged and rumors of a divorce get into the papers. The wife's old father (Thomas Commerford) living elsewhere, reads of this and decides to visit his daughter. She is out when he arrives. The old man loves his two grandchildren and plays with them. They play post office in the garret. The children find a bundle of their parents' old love letters for the game. Grandpa reads some of them and finds them full of endearing terms. The game is prolonged for a day or two, during which time the old man contrives to have the children deliver some of these letters at psychological moments to their parents. The days of their happy courtship being brought back to them by their own youngsters has the desired effect, and the old man departs in happiness. This is a very pretty little story with a good punch in it, and fairly well played. It is well that the story is good because none of the settings—all interiors but one—would ever take even fourth prize in a stage-setting contest.

Independent

"CLARA'S MYSTERIOUS TOYS" (Eclair), August 10.—A series of trick photographs that work out marvelous transformations before our eyes and that are surely entertaining, as a novelty, for both children and grown folks. It is clearly photographed.

"A WOMAN'S TRICKS" (Eclair), August 10.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this light rural character sketch in comedy vein. It is a hand-colored picture; was made in France; has interesting backgrounds, and the peasant characters are naturally set forth. The photography is only fair. The two together make a good offering that it is safe to commend.

"ON THE RANGERS' ROLL OF HONOR" (Frontier), August 9.—The slight, tragic incident set forth by this picture seems to us worth while and we enjoyed it. The hero wants to make good for the sake of a girl and gets a job on the Texas rangers, where he is plainly out of place; yet, after letting a prisoner escape into the desert, he follows and dies alone with him out on the sands. The backgrounds are fine and help the story much, but the acting of the leading man is not quite convincing. A pretty good release. The photography is clear and commendable.

"DARKFEATHER'S SACRIFICE" (Nestor), August 11.—Another Mona picture, which gives us quite an improvement on the ordinary Indian film. In this case the Indian girl graduate goes back to her people, falls in love with a white man whom she finds dying on the desert, only to surrender him later to his white sweetheart. Some of the scenes are very picturesque, particularly those of the girl in the canoe. Mona's work is convincing and she gave quite a pathetic touch to the close.

"THE QUAKERESS" (Broncho), August 13.—This is a remarkably effective two-reel picture of old colonial days, when the blue laws were in evidence and Puritans ruled the land. Priscilla is ducked in the pool because she becomes a Quakeress and later is banished from her village. But she and her lover discover that Indians are coming and hasten back to warn their former friends. The Indians were very picturesque. The escape from the block house and subsequent blowing up of the structure, Indians included, was well devised. The wedding at the close was very pretty. A desirable release.

"THE ANIMAL" (Rex), August 17.—This picture is produced by Allan Dwan with former members of the American company. The story is not a pleasant one—the chief character is a man who is jealous of his wife's love for their own baby.

"HAWKEYE TO THE RESCUE" (Nestor), August 15.—This starts out like a dramatic offering, but suddenly descends into burlesque, and for that reason is not a great success in either way. The smugglers are gotten up in the costumes of pirates and the action takes place mostly on the sea in open boats.

"THE GREAT TOWEL ROBBERY" (Powers), August 13.—An enjoyable burlesque comedy. The show troupe, suspected of having stolen four towels, are pursued by four constables and their assistants. The troupe's wagon breaks down, one of the constables is doused in a tub, and many other nonsensical things occur. This comes under the head of enjoyable foolishness.

"SALLY SCRAGGS, HOUSEMAID" (Rex), August 14.—A comedy drama of excellent handling, with Robert Leonard and Marguerita Fisher in the leading roles. The boarding house scenes were typical and full of interest and amusement. We could not quite account for the abrupt change in the girl's station, and thought it might have been shown a little more convincingly how she happened to be employed as housemaid. But this is far ahead of the average comedy offering, though the plot is not entirely new. Bright and pleasing comedy.

"CAMPING WITH CUSTER" (Bison), August 12.—A two-reel offering containing a fair impersonation of General Custer. The action centers about his young nieces and the adventures in the Indian country. They are captured and rescued in turn several times and something about the good photographic effects and helter skelter style of plot makes this more interesting than some of the cut-and-dried Western releases of recent date. Wolf Fang, the Indian who continually incites his band to warfare, is killed at the last of the film. An entertaining number.

"MAN'S DUTY" (Rex), August 10.—Mixed motives and a series of unpleasant incidents characterize this offering. The story is based on a broad theme and is strongly acted, but it does not leave a very good feeling with the observer. The man refuses to marry the girl he has wronged. Another offers to wed her, but she refuses and becomes the mother of an illegitimate child. Later the first man meets a blind girl and her innocence and virtue have a softening influence upon him. He then returns to the girl he had cast off.

"PARASITES OF THE FROG" (Itala).—An extremely well photographed picture of microbes and the like found in the intestines of a frog. It will be most instructive to classes in science, but will mean little to the average spectator. It is a wonderful picture for the right audience.

"THE PROTECTORY'S OLDEST BOY" (Thanhouser), August 5.—An abused newsboy is taken to the Protectory, and later meets the granddaughter of his benefactor, the inference being that in later years they will marry. The picture, however, features principally the parades and drill work of the boys' school.

"THE SILLY SEX" (Reliance), August 6.—A Forrest Halsey story. The man-hater and the woman-hater meet on a small island. She borrows his clothes while he is in bathing, much to his disgust. Later, of course, they fall in love. A light comedy of ordinary interest.

"KENTUCKY FOES" (Reliance), August 11.—There are dramatic moments in this feud story, but it is not free from absurdities. Andy's recovery looked impossible, considering the distance which he fell. A great many pictures nowadays are resurrecting characters at the last moment which the audience has been led to think were dead. Good photography and a stirring finish help this picture along very much.

"THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA" (Reliance), August 4.—A lively reel, once the action begins. The doctor's wife is besieged by burglars at the moment he is attending a patient suffering from heart failure. The telephone communications did not quite jibe in one place, but the scene gets over strongly and thus makes altogether a very interesting reel.

"RUNA PLAYS CUPID" (Reliance), August 13.—A children's garden-party is first shown in this, with goats drawing the guests in carriages. The photography is good, but the story arouses no great interest. The child's illness brings her mother and Dr. Hall together.

"MATING" (Imp), August 11.—A strong story by Fay Wallace, following the lines of "The Story of Ab," "Before Adam," and other narratives dating back to prehistoric days. We see the cave man woo his dusky mate by sheer force of brute strength, wresting her from the little man because he happened to be stronger. The same characters, cleverly portrayed by Matt Moore, Jane Gail and John C. Brownell, appear in a later reincarnation. Here the strong man wields the pick and the little man is a professor. This time, by force of his mentality, the little man wins the girl. The picture excites interest and stirs up thought. It is a commendable two-reel offering.

"SOLDIERS THREE" (Bison), August 16.—A two-reel war drama with a good many excellent points, in spite of the fact that the photography is not clear in a few places. The love story is well developed and dominates the film. It is not lost amid the smoke of battle, as sometimes happens. The manner in which the villain arranged to get credit for saving the color bearer on the field was good drama, well enacted. The second reel picks up the story after the war, and for a time has some difficulty in sustaining the interest, because of new situations. Nevertheless, the experiences of the disillusioned wife until she finds happiness with Ned are interesting. The ending was not quite as strong as the fore part of the story. A good war release.

"O! YOU SCOTCH LASSIE" (Crystal), August 10.—The action of this centers about a mask ball which ends in a sort of rough house. A few laughs emerge from the audience, but the story is very light.

"STARVING FOR LOVE" (Crystal), August 10.—This, on same reel with the foregoing, is a quieter sort of comedy, with a better idea back of it. The girl goes on a hunger strike and refuses to eat until papa consents to her marriage with Chester. Chester feeds her surreptitiously, but when he gets thrown into jail her courage almost fails. Quite amusing.

"A NEW WAY OF WINNING A GIRL" (Gem), August 11.—The plot in this is rather slight. Jack learns how to hypnotize people and places a number of people under his spell at the same time. He robs them and throws the blame on Billy. The situations lack freshness, though the photography is very fair.

"THE FLOWER GIRL AND THE COUNTERFEITER" (Imp), August 18.— The highly romantic phases of this film story make one forget its numerous shortcomings. The flower girl sends her savings to the discharged detective, telling him to get some new clothes and brace up. He carries out these instructions and by her aid rounds up the counterfeiting gang and is reinstated on the force. The counterfeiters looked more like members of the Black Hand than makers of queer money, as ordinarily pictured. The story is an entertaining one, though improbable.

"HOW WOMEN LOVE" (Crystal), August 12.—The rich girl, who marries a poor musician, has to sew for a living. Her employer insults her and she is discharged for striking him. Later comes the reconciliation with her father and all ends happily. The colored man playing the butler in this seemed to offer possibilities as a negro comedian. A fairly interesting reel.

"FLAME IN THE ASHES" (Kaybee), August 15.—A strong two-reel story, centering about a soldier who could not overcome his love for drink. Drink and a Mexican woman lead him into disgrace and he resigns from the service. Ten years later he returns to the post, old and broken, to find his daughter in danger from both Indians and Mexicans. The old man sets a bomb in the cellar of the hotel, rescues his daughter, and then goes back to die with the others. The explosion scene was very realistic.

"LIZBETH" (Imp), August 14.—A picture filled with natural, characteristic home scenes, in which the adopted girl falls in love with the son from the city. Claire Mersereau makes a very appealing appearance as the romantic young girl, whose love proves hopeless, as the son is already engaged. She nurses him through a contagious disease and then dies of it herself. Wm. E. Shay appears as the son and Jane Fearnley as his sweetheart. A good release.

"THE ADVENTURES OF JACQUES" (American), August 11.—A two-reel offering, in which admirers of Warren Kerrigan have opportunity to see him as a genuine swashbuckling hero. The costuming is carefully done and the settings admirable, though a trifle modern in some respects. The story is one of the Stanley J. Weyman type; Jacques has a ready sword and knows how to use it. He rescues the princess from the tower and later saves the life of the king. He places the girl in a convent and goes forth to other interesting adventures, all nicely pictured. The story is not very clear in places, but the spirit of adventure is always apparent and the release is altogether an attractive one.

"OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM" (Reliance), August 16.—A natural story, with the scenes laid in the home of a minister and his family. The little girl loves to play with the poor neighbor children, but the parents do not like this very much, until one of the poor children keeps Renia from falling down the well. This scene has good suspense and the story, while simple, will have quite a strong appeal.

"THE FIGHT FOR RIGHT" (Reliance), August 9.—A two-part reel, produced under the auspices of the National Committee of Prison Labor. It is a strong arraignment of the convict labor contract system, the story being arranged by James Oppenheim. Rosemary Theby and Irving Cummings play the leads. Views of a knitting mill are shown and also numerous prison scenes and pictures of convicts working on the state farm in New Jersey. The observer is always conscious that he is being influenced against the contract system, but the story itself has sufficient dramatic interest to give it appeal. We liked particularly the closing scenes in the halls of the legislature, where Mary and John bring in the crippled brother and make their plea before the Assembly Committee. A strong preachment against the contract system.

"THE LATEST IN LIFE SAVING" (Keystone), August 7.—The scientific side of this half reel overshadows the comedy plot. Actual views of the torpedo life buoy and pulmotor are shown in active service. Interesting and instructive.

"A GAME OF POOL" (Keystone), August 7.—On same reel with above. A very funny pool game, in which Sterling hires a young man with a magnet to help him make a few difficult shots on the pool table. All goes well till his opponent bribes the young fellow to help himself instead of Sterling. Some laughs in this, particularly for pool sharks. A good release.

"AN EVEN EXCHANGE" (American), August 16.—Because the express company will not pay a certain price for some land, the girl and her lover rob the company's stage of its treasure box. Later the girl's conscience pricks her and she reveals the location of the box, but not until the company's agent has come to terms on the land matter. An interesting picture, but the plot is a rather doubtful one from the standpoint of good conduct.

"THE RIOT" (Keystone), August 7.—Here is a full reel given over to a free-for-all fight, in which bricks and bombs are thrown and the police, fire department and militia respond to quell the riot. It all begins over Cohen's saleslady, whose parcels are opened by the Irish children. A race war ensues and the situations contain a lot of harmless amusement, free from vulgarity.

"HEARTS AND HOOFS" (Majestic), August 5.—A trained horse is featured in this simple story of Western life. It goes for water and carries the canteen to the girl's father on the desert. The scenes are attractive and the story is one that will be followed with interest.

"TOLD IN THE FUTURE" (Majestic), August 3.—A young man whose father wants him to give up a poor girl for a rich one has a dream. He sees himself married to the rich girl, only to come to financial ruin and unhappiness in the end. The dream is well pictured and when he awakens he determines to marry the poor girl. His father finally relents and all ends well. An entertaining offering.

"THE GIRL OF THE CABARET" (Thanhouser), August 8.—There is seemingly a perennial interest in this type of story, wherein a young man weds a girl from a music hall. She afterwards leaves him, only to find that the place has lost its charm and is glad when he discovers her and takes her home. Harry Benham and Marguerite Snow, assisted by the Thanhouser Kidlet, work this story out in a very attractive and appealing manner.

"MASQUERADING IN BEAR CANYON" (Frontier), August 7.—The pretty young invalid girl changes costumes with the goat girl, and the latter, while playing sick, captivates the young doctor. The picturesque goat herd, the attractive Western scenery and the breezy treatment of this light plot make altogether an entertaining reel. The photography lacks clearness in places, but as a whole is acceptable.

"OH! SUCH A BEAUTIFUL OCEAN" (Thanhouser), August 10.—A breezy summer story at a watering resort, with William Russell and Florence La Badie in the leading parts. The hero upsets his boat so he must be rescued by the yacht, and thus contrives to join the party without an invitation. Attractive scenes and a brisk, humorous story combine to make this a good comedy offering.

Moving Picture Educator

THE ECLAIR EDUCATIONAL CATALOGUE.

By Rev. W. H. Jackson.

WE have just received a copy of the educational catalogue issued by the Eclair Company, which is a valuable addition to those already published by the General Film Company and the Gaumont Company. The Eclair catalogue seems to specialize in its "Travelogue" section, which is a most thorough one, dealing with the least known parts of the world. Beautiful scenery has often been the main attraction, while educationally descriptive pictures open up vast sections of interesting countries. Religious rites, manners and customs, animal life, local industrials in all their strange and fascinating detail, are depicted with all the realistic powers of the kinematograph. But a few years ago we were dependent upon two men, who, by the aid of the stereopticon, gave us in their "travelogues" an illustrated description of their world-wide travels; while of great educational value, these lectures were costly and within the limited range of the few, while, of course, the pictures were "still" ones. By the aid of the Eclair series, every person in the land, especially school children, can see in actual life every country and people of the earth; their manner of living and the methods by which they earn their livelihood; how they worship or take their pleasures. Two other sections of the catalogue are devoted to educational and scientific subjects, each of which is full of most interesting instruction which will be of great help in every educational institution in the world.

Constant readers of this page have from time to time seen notices of these productions, and to those who have not, a copy of the catalogue will be a revelation which will repay many times the value of time spent in its study. We advise all our readers to secure a copy of the Eclair Educational Catalogue.

In the Train From Kandy to Colombo—(Eclair).

This is probably as interesting an eighty-mile railroad trip as may be found anywhere in the world. Seldom in so short a ride may one see so many changes as here. Winding round and through rugged cliffs, tunnelled at convenient places, yet always amid entrancing scenery, where a powerful and luxurious vegetation invades the ground. Tall palms, cocoa nut and similar trees abound with all the profusion of a tropical but not a sun-dried country. Fields of rice cover the cleared grounds, and even the swampy ground seems to produce that which is at once beautiful and useful. In Colombo one finds a strangely beautiful place made attractive by its contrasts. Here we have automobiles side by side with man-drawn Jinrikshas; trolley-cars and cow-teams, well-dressed Europeans and half-naked natives. The railroad station is a monument of beauty, the shrines and temples of the native deities are also, according to the beauty, often found in such rugged splendor; while the old streets and native homes seem to have remained unaltered for centuries. Seldom have we seen a picture where nature and man thrived in such distinct yet attractive contrasts; it is a picture which presents a short, yet varied and full of information, as also a pleasing journey.

Animalcula—Tiny Organisms Which Inhabit Stagnant Waters.

This is a picture revealing the wonderful creations which are found in such minute form in the smallest orders of life. Too small for more than scientific research, made formerly only for stated scientific purposes, they are now becoming as interesting as any other form of larger life; indeed it is a question if in this realm of natural history there is not more interesting study than is found in the forest, field or waters.

These pictures show that among the numerous infusoria which inhabit ponds, some are remarkable for their strange shape. These are called vorticella and stentors; older naturalists call these animalcula "trumpets."

In this subject, a plank is taken from the water covered with slime; this is scraped off and submitted to microscopic examination. There is now revealed living vorticellae, small, vase-shaped objects, with a mouth at the top, supported on a corkscrew-like filament, which can be lengthened or shortened at will.

Their manner of living is shown in that they assemble in colonies, the water must not be too bad, and there must be microbes enough to feed them and allow them to multiply. Each specimen is surmounted by a sort of crown of vibratory filament. In these colonies it is found that each subject remains alone, living independent, and fixing its filament in a separate place.

Attached to vegetable refuse by their lower extremity, the stentors balance themselves slowly, and pick up floating scraps on which they live. When alarmed, they shrink, yet suddenly spread out again, as if to make up for lost time; it should be noticed that these stentors have a voracious appetite.

Their manners and customs further show that when there is no more food they must either shift their quarters or die. The boldest or most hungry of them make the first move, and set off in quest of adventure. Like the Trojans, scattered among the ruins of their homes, they go where the current drives them, houseless and homeless. They are not long, however, thus; each of them is able to form a new colony of its own, by breaking up into tiny divisions. In a few hours the old dispersed colony has formed as many colonies as it had members originally.

The end: A little crab comes along; he brushes against the family of stentors which at once contract into the shape of a pear; now the little creature which was so graceful a moment ago becomes but the fragment of a shell.

It is of no importance where this film is shown, it will secure interest. The ignorant will be profoundly impressed; the school child will have a most awakened interest, the student will pursue it with renewed vigor; while the trained scientist will find new details worthy of deeper examination. This smallest of living organisms is as full of interest as any other order of life. The Eclair Company have, as usual, increased the value of their splendid list of natural-history subjects, with this study of the lowliest form of life.

The Amblystome—The Curious Salamander of Mexico.

This is an unusual natural-history picture dealing with a subject of unusual interest, and is quite a revelation of the process of development of this and similar animals. Thanks to the power of micro-photo-kinematography, the varied transformations and stages are shown on the screen as follows:

1. The transformations of the Amblystome often remain incomplete, it is then called an Axoloit; it retains its fish-gilla and remains in an aquatic state.

2. The spawn of these batrachia is often formed of gelatinous globules of which the egg is the kernel.

3. First signs of life. The embryo frees itself from the mucus which serves to protect it.

4. The feet, which are not webbed, are formed at the age of three or four months.

5. The head is adorned as with plumes, by the fish-gills which are in constant motion, caused by the effort of breathing.

6. The head presents a strange appearance; the large mouth shows its veracity.

7. The movements in the water are graceful.

8. Albino varieties are captured in underground streams.

9. These animals feed on living prey over which they fight veraciously.

10. The Axoloit — or undeveloped Amblystome — only reaches its definite shape after being obliged to live in the air by the force of circumstances. It then loses its gills, breathes by means of lungs, and takes the name of Amblystome. Each of these stages are most thoroughly shown and are as interesting to the unlearned as to the searcher of natural-history curiosities. The Eclair have here another addition to their long list of kindred subjects.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"KENTUCKY FOES" (Reliance).

With almost every scene laid in beautiful exterior settings, and handsome Alan Hale and Pretty Irene Hunt playing the leading roles, this thrilling drama of love and feud in the Kentucky mountains is an unusually strong offering.

The Nelsons and the Amsdens are enemies and the oldest son of each house loves pretty Bessie Lee. She favors Andy Amsden. But, one day when he tries to kiss her she notices he has been drinking and pushes him away. He falls over the cliff. Fred Nelson happens along and Bessie in terror sends him down to look at Andy's body. He is seen in the act by little Jack, Andy's brother, who alarms the whole clan of Amsdens, thinking Fred has killed Andy in a quarrel. Fred and Bessie take refuge in an old shack. As the Amsdens break in Bessie gets out of a back window to go for help. She finds Andy recovering consciousness and brings him to the shack in time to save Fred's life. His danger has showed her which one she really loves and she goes willingly to Fred's arms.

Scene from "Kentucky Foes" (Reliance).

George Siegman as Andy, and Bobby Tansey as little Jack both do excellent work in this drama which will be released on August 11th.

"ALKALI IKE'S GAL" (Essanay).

One of the most interesting, amusing and entertaining western comedies produced and released by the Essanay Film Mfg. Company, is the two reel Augustus Carney feature entitled "Alkali Ike's Gal."

The cast includes such eminent photoplay artists as Margaret Joslyn (the famous Sophie), Harry Todd, Fred Church and Victor Potel. The theme is a clever one and many laughable situations are brought about by the naturalness of the artists.

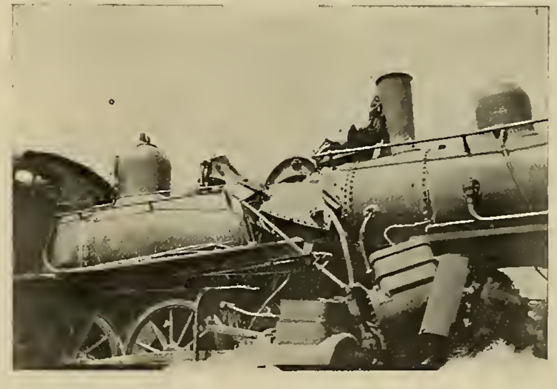
"Alkali Ike" seated on the edge of the bed, tugging furiously at a patch on his corduroy trousers, is interrupted by the mailman, who presents him with a circular letter. Slippery Slim, Mustang Pete and Rawhide Bill, all from Snakeville, are honored with similar communications. And what do you suppose the letters contain? Listen! The Dotty Matrimonial Agency offers reduced rates on June brides. The letters appeal to each of the men and each one flatters himself by thinking that he is the only one who has received the heavenly announcement. The photo of the prospective bride, the matrimonial agency offers, gives each of the men an idea of what they can get by communicating with the bureau.

"She's a bear," exclaims "Alkali Ike," as he tears a calender from the wall and writes a very flattering note to the young lady whose photo appears on the circular. Each of the other recipients of the circulars gets busy at once with a composition of a letter to the fair lady who is seeking a husband, and nightfall finds each applicant for the lady's hand and heart, on his way to the mailbox with his reply to the circular. By some strange coincidence, each lonely individual has advised the lady of his choice that she will be able to recognize him, by the fact that he will wear a white rose in his buttonhole. They plead with her to come on the Friday stage. It happens that "Alkali Ike" arises early the morning of the lady's expected arrival and thus is able to obtain the only rose which blooms in Snakeville. The fair and sylphlike (300 lb.) Sophie arrives on the appointed day and is met by "Alkali." Can you imagine the surprise, humiliation, anger and hate the three men nurse in the bosom of their hearts when they see the shrimplike form of "Alkali" with the matrimonial prize. Many laughable and amusing situations take place after this notable meeting, which makes this two reel feature not only an excellent subject but a wonderful box office attraction.

Augustus Carney in the title, creates a furore. Margaret Joslyn as Sophie Clutts, more than demonstrates her remarkable ability as a comedienne. This production is booked for release Friday, August 15th.

VITAGRAPH PULLS HEAD-ON COLLISION.

A large company of Vitagraph players under the direction of Ralph Ince, assisted by A. V. Smith and Walter Ackerman, went over Jersey last Saturday and astonished the natives with a regular head-on railway collision. Two locomotives had been chartered, one having a complement of three passenger coaches, the other running light, and were started over the tracks of the Raritan River Railroad. The impact of the collision between the engines must have been terrific for the accompanying picture shows the result of considerable force. In the coaches dummies had been placed and the work of rescuing them from the burning cars was quite realistic.



Notice of the event was sent in advance to several New York papers and most of them gave liberal space to the "catastrophy" in the Sunday editions.

NEW MANAGER FOR ENTERPRISE.

Mr. O. F. Spahr, for many years connected with the Enterprise Optical Mfg. Company, has assumed the active management of the company, Mr. L. A. Woodward, the former vice-president and manager having retired, and is no longer connected with the company. Mr. Spahr has been in close touch, during the past several years, with the President and General Manager, Mr. Roebuck, and is well qualified to carry out the well-known Enterprise policies.

"OVER THE CRIB" (Lubin).

Ths Lubin picture will appeal to women, especially mothers; the intensity of the story is beyond the usual, but it finally gives happiness to all characters in the drama. The cast is well selected and the acting does credit to the players. The photoplay will doubtless have recognition for a long run.

Jerry Smithson is a lonely bachelor with a great love for children. He goes daily to the asylum to watch the youngsters play and it gives him happiness. Mrs. Wendell deserted by her husband and almost destitute takes her little child to the aslyum in the hope that it may be adopted by a family that can give it care and love. Smithson adopts the child and Dorothy soon reigns mistress of the bachelor's heart and home. Finding that he is unable to properly care for the child, Smithson advertises for a nurse and Ethel Langdon is engaged. Dorothy quickly takes to the nurse and Smithson finds himself gradually falling in love. The climax comes when Dorothy playing at a kissing game orders her foster father to kiss the nurse. This opens to a happy future. They are married and worship the child that has brought them together. Mrs. Wendell has reached the limit of necessity when her husband returns rich and penitent. The wife forgives him and then he learns of the child being sent to the asylum. The frantic pleas of Dorothy's parents induce the authorities to give the child's address and going to Smithson they claim her. The parting is a sad one, but Ethel gets out some tiny baby clothes and pressing them to her breast smiles at a future more happy even than the past.

Scene from "Over the Crib" (Lubin).

STREYCKMANS RESIGNS FROM MUTUAL.

Hector J. Streyckmans, who has been connected with the Mutual Film Corporation since its formation as editor of the Mutual Observer and in an advisory capacity, has resigned to take the management of a new company in which is associated with him Mr. Albert Amato and Oreste Zallio. Mr. Streyckmans announces that the first release of his company will be a picture entitled "The Last Days of Pompeii" made by the Pasquali Company of Turin, Italy. This is an eight reel subject of great interest. Other subjects will be a picture interpretation of the famous Italian story by Alessandro Manzoni entitled "I Promessi Sposi," or "The Betrothed," and "The Two Sergeants," both in six reels.

Mr. Streyckmans is one of the best equipped motion picture men in the business today and should succeed in his new venture.

MR. NICHOLAS POWER ON VACATION.

Mr. Nicholas Power, president of the Nicholas Power Company, is spending the summer at Shelter Island. Mr. Power evidently believes in the intermittent movement, as he alternates between Shelter Island and New York, thus keeping an eye on his enormous business, and holding the reins of government.

DARING SCENE IN KLEINE—CINES RELEASE.

Those of the "profession" are not often deceived by daring falls and similar spectacular "touches" in pictures, yet the Kleine-Cines release for August 26, "The Human Bridge," contains a bit of action that has puzzled several well known Chicago producers who have tried to solve the problem of its making. A party of seven men and a woman, pursued by a posse, find themselves confronted by a gap in the mountains with no way of crossing it. They form a human bridge, allowing the woman to cross in that way. How this is done is a matter of amazement. The camera was placed far enough away to show a gap of about twelve feet between the cliffs and easily fifty feet of straight-rising front. In silhouette, the men climb upon each others shoulders and the column of men reel toward the yawning chasm. The film is cut here and a closer-up view follows, showing the men tightly holding to each other. There was no change in location made nor is there any trickery on the part of the camera. The feat was actually performed but how it was done is not known this side of the Atlantic.

"THE FIVE COPIES" (Great Northern).

This is an amusing comedy in which we find the boss and all of the office help in love with Clara the charming typist. She favors Lionel, however, and on one eventful day when he is called upon to make five copies of an important document, he leaves the carbons in the machine while answering a call from the factory. Clara hastily writes this message on the paper adjusted in the typewriter: "I love you. Meet me in the park at 8 to-night." Clara is then called into the office of the boss and while taking dictation the clerks in the office appropriate in turn one of the notes. Later a copy falls into the hands of the "old man," who also has a keen regard for his pretty typist. Just before the time of closing the office there is a strong demand on the petty cash drawer. Fatty, the utility man, is the only one who is left out of the proposition of drawing in advance.

Scene from "The Five Copies" (Gt. Northern).

We next see the boss "smartening up." A few minutes before eight, three fellows suddenly meet in the park, including Fatty, who persists in going their way. He is badly smitten. At a distance, the "Guvnor" is puffing along in great style, and is cursing the heat. He gets "a cold shiver," however, when he turns the path, and sees four of his employees assiduously paying attention to his stenographer. He decides that it is no place for him.

Just as Lionel and Clara are getting tired of it all a carriage comes along. Fatty hails it, thinking thereby to persuade Clara to go for a drive, but Lionel is too quick for him, and springs into the vehicle with the girl before Fatty can ascend the steps. The twain drive away together, the disappointed are left lamenting, and thus ends the comedy of "The Five Copies."

PURCHASE THREE STATE RIGHTS.

The Popular Plays Film Co., Meriden, Conn., has purchased the state rights for the Pilot three-part feature, "The Streets of New York," for Connecticut, Rhode Island and Massachusetts. Messrs. Pindar and Rudloff, who are the organizers of the company, are old picture men.

FRITZI BRUNETTE WITH UNIVERSAL.

Following the announcement of Florence Lawrence's engagement to play leads with the Universal, comes the news that Miss Fritzi Brunette has returned to her first love, and will also star under the banners of the whirling orb. Miss Brunette, who for a long time was leading woman in the Victor and Powers companies, has made a remarkable reputation for her conscientious and intelligent work, and has a wide following throughout filmdom. She will be an important addition to the remarkable constellation of stars that will shine this season in the Universal firmament. Glen White will play opposite Miss Brunette in the new Gem series.

"THE POLICE INSPECTOR."

Under the above title the Belmont Film Company of 145 West 45th Street, New York, has issued a three part picture dealing with the efforts of the inspector of police to recover stolen jewels and to apprehend the thieves. It is full of real sensations and thrills appealing to promoters of state right subjects. The firm handling "The Police Inspector" has just been formed and this is its first release. The members are experienced motion picture men who have been in the business for several years and know a good picture when it is offered. There are no objectionable scenes in "The Police Inspector," but the policemen and police apparatus are the real thing, secured from the department of one of the large cities of the United States. From the discription it would seem that this feature should be a money getter. The Belmont Company has a full line of attractive poster lobby displays.

GAUMONT CO. IN WORLD'S TOWER BUILDING.

In order to more thoroughly cope with the tremendous amount of work necessitated by the recent additions made to their Flushing plant, whereby the capacity and output of the firm has been more than doubled, the Gaumont Company has rented a large suite in the World's Tower Building, 14 West 40th St., New York City, consisting of offices, projecting room, shipping department, and reception rooms. From September 1st onward a great deal of the office work will be transferred from Flushing to New York, and it will undoubtedly be a very great convenience for customers to see the principals in the city itself.

The Gaumont firm has lately entered into extensive contracts for printing and developing, its plant has recently been thoroughly overhauled, a lot of new machinery has been shipped from Paris to Flushing in order to render the plant up to date, and the Gaumont studios now rank on a par with the largest and best equipped moving picture plants in the United States.

SOME CLEVELAND ATTRACTIONS.

W. S. Cleveland, who books and routes big acts for the Fidelity Booking Offices, announces that there are more big feature acts now playing on the Cleveland-Fidelity Circuit than any popular-price agency has ever before handled at any one time. In support of this claim he gives the following list of attractions that are now "trouping" under his guidance: Bristol's Equine Exhibition, Paolo Cremonesi & Co., Five Musical MacLarens, Howard Anderson Co., Four Aerial Lesters, The St. Julians, Newsboys' Sextette, Whiting's Operatic Dolls, Four Brass Men, "The Days of '61," Martinez Family, Four Troupers, Hanley & Jarvis, Three Muckle Macks, Bob Kelly's Fourteen Funny Folk, Oxford Bicycle Basket Ball Champions, The Ricci Trio, Simple Simon Company, Hawthorne's Minstrel Maids, Kendall's Auto Girls, "The Tin Wedding" Company, Lewis' Dog and Monkey Circus, Eight European Belles, Agoust Troupe, Four Luciers, Huling's Bareback Riding Seals, Whalen, West & Whalen, Beaumont's Ponies, The Romero Family, Manchester Brothers' Mephisto Cabaret, Three Paragons, International Polo Teams, The Nola Family, Three Romans, Clivette, Palace of Parisian Models, "The Preacher and the Man," Takezawa Japanese Troupe, La Mont's Sextette, "As a Man Sows," The Colonial Singing Studio, Four Californians, Three Juggling Bannans, Heidelburg Four, Imperial Comedy Trio, Rose Troupe and many others.

KLIEGL CATALOG OUT.

Kliegl Brothers, or the Universal Electric Stage Lighting Company, have just issued a new catalog of their line of lighting apparatus and effects. The booklet notes a number of devices specially adapted to the uses of motion picture studios. These devices are being used to advantage in a number of studios.

SCHNEIDER'S DISPLAY AT THE EXPOSITION.

One of the attractive displays at the recent Motion Picture Exposition at Grand Central Palace, New York, was that made by Eberhardt Schneider, maker of all kinds of motion picture machines. The exhibit was interesting for the numerous devices shown and for its collection of some of the first machines used to make motion pictures in America, crude beginnings that foretold the coming of the perfected mechanism in use today. The accompanying illustration shows a band of Indians who are appearing with F. E. Moore in an outdoor presentation of the play "Hiawatha" at Van Cortlandt Park, New York. Mr. Moore's "Hiawatha" picture was made with a Schneider camera and Mr. Schneider invited the Indians to the exposition. They were deeply interested in the show and enjoyed the pictures shown in the theaters on the mezzanine floor.

EBERHARD SCHNEIDER
FILM MAKING MACHINES.

Mr. Schneider was greatly pleased with the exposition as he was able to make a number of sales on the floor and has had large re-orders since on the strength of his exhibit. Schneider's motion picture devices are in general use and the little factory on Second Avenue, New York, is working overtime these days to keep up with the demand.

"SAPHO" AND SENSATIONALISM.

Florence Roberts' "Sapho" is not intended as a sensational feature, says New Majestic in advising exhibitors who want that class of feature, not to hook this film. Miss Roberts, Shelly Hull, Director Henderson and the New Majestic force, responsible for the production of the feature, simply strove for a high art subject that could carry no double construction. This latter has too often been the fault of stage versions. In fact, Miss Roberts says that all engaged in the making of the film kept in mind the object of Author Daudet's dedication of the work—to his sons. Daudet, in the dedication remarked that such a writing as "Sapho" should be of strong moral benefit to the sons, and says she wants her film of "Sapho" to be of benefit to the sons of Americans everywhere. The picturized "Sapho" will give the picture theater a chance for a laugh on the film reformer. The reason is simple. It's "clean."

KLEINE'S FLY-PEST FILM MAKES RECORD.

"The Fly Pest" was made by The Urban Eclipse Co. more than a year ago. Released by George Kleine in this country, this remarkable film gathered a train of oddly assorted admirers in addition to its regular buyers, until last week the record mark of 28 boards of health in various cities and states of the Union that have purchased the film, was made.

Among the many other businesses that have ordered one or more copies of "The Fly Pest" are The National Cash Register Co., The Washington, D. C. Evening Star, University of Wisconsin, The Battle Creek Sanitarium, American Steel and Wire Co. and Okalhoma Agricultural College.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

A RECENT change is the appointment of Mr. J. A. Eslow as manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, who secceeds Mr. Harry Asher, who had been in charge of this exchange since its inception, before which he was manager of the W. E. Greene Film Exchange, which was taken over by the Universal folks. Mr. Eslow's appointment came as a surprise—but a most agreeable one—to New England exhibitors, who had learned of the latter's square-dealings when he was manager of the Mutual Film Corporation's Boston offices.

Mr. Harry F. Campbell continues as assistant manager of the Universal Exchange. As these columns have told, Mr. Eslow only recently severed his connection with the Mutual offices, and made a short trip to Chicago, only to return in his present position.

Another bit of exchange news is that Mr. Anthony Stein, better known as "Buck," who has been booking manager of the Mutual Film Corporation's Boston offices, resigned this week to accept a position with the Universal Company. "Buck," who is an unusually popular and able chap, enters upon his new duties with the best wishes of his many friends in the trade.

More exchange news is that Mr. William Dunne who has held forth as assistant "booker" at the Mutual's Boston offices, has been transferred to the Waterville, Me., branch of this company.

Manager Bradley, of the Mutual's Boston offices, spent this week in Maine, looking over local conditions, and, also to feel the pulse of his Waterville, Me., branch office. Mr. Bradley is on the road considerable, and is lucky in having as assistant manager, Mr. George I. Appleby, who is easily able to care for things in Boston.

The last bit of exchange gossip is about the Boston offices of the General Film Company, which it might be remarked, is doing a big business here, notwithstanding the keen competition. It seems that the General Film Company has been in the habit of operating a "pick-up" wagon, which called at the various licensed houses in Boston taking up the films. The "pick-up" wagon was very convenient, and really needful, due to the fact that the various Boston film exchanges are located in out-of-the-way spots, because of a new state law, which forbids the keeping of films in congested parts of the city. Suddenly the wagon was taken off, and it was up to the operators to carry the films to and from the exchange. The operators' union promptly sent a committee to wait upon the exchange, which entered a firm protest, saying that union operators did not wish to carry these films. The answer to the protest is that the "pick-up" wagon is again on the job to the entire satisfaction of everyone.

Mr. Felix Alland, part owner and manager of the Pastime Theater, Boston, evidently is very much taken with the service he is getting from the Mutual folks in this house, as he has just contracted for Mutual films for his Orpheum Theater, Brockton, Mass. Mr. Alland is one of the livest and most able exhibitors in this section, and proved his claims to this distinction by the Orpheum. This house had been run very poorly, and was not on a real paying basis, when acquired by Mr. Alland. The Orpheum is now doing a dandy business as a regular thing, due to proper management. The house will open for its season on August fifteenth. Mr. Alland's Pastime is also prosperous.

Gordon and Lord's Scollay Square Olympia Theater, Boston, is now scheduled for its initial opening on October the first, and this writer does not hesitate to state that this theater will be the finest and most expensive house in the world, built expressly for the exploitation of vaudeville and motion pictures. Some idea of the scale of true magnificence of this house may be grasped when it is understood that, besides a full orchestra, an organ costing many thousands of dollars is being installed. A unique idea is a tea-room, which is being built inside the theater. Mr. Arthur E. Lord, Mr. Nathan Gordon and Mr. Frank Howard are among the prominent moving picture men interested in this project, which cost nearly one million dollars to execute.

Mr. Simon Friedman, of Wocester, Mass., reports that his offices in the Mutual Building on State Street are very busy indeed, this summer, due to the fact that he is about to build a theater of considerable proportions. Mr. Friedman is going in for a two-story building, which will include both a theater to be devoted to pictures and vaudeville, and a suite of business offices. The land measures 150 by 68 feet, and the entire structure will be thoroughly modern and fireproof in every way.

Mr. T. Goldberg, of Main Street, Hartford, Conn., is about to build what will probably be the finest theater in this city devoted to programs of vaudeville and pictures. The house will have a balcony, and a total seating capacity of close to 2,000 people. The building will be a five-story affair, built entirely of brick, and will include offices, as well as the theater itself.

Mr. Nathan Spector, of Hartford, Conn., states that he has received his plans calling for a moving picture and vaudeville theater, at a cost of about $18,000. Mr. Spector will have a theater to seat over 1,000, and has selected a lot of land measuring 65 by 75 feet. This house will use vaudeville acts as well as photoplays, when completed.

Another new theater is promised for Hartford, Conn., by the well known firm of D'Avino and Marchetti, which is now having plans made for a house to seat 700. An up-to-the-minute house is promised, in which straight programs of pictures will be offered.

The Wilber Theater Trust, of which concern E. D. Smith, of Boston, is general manager, has awarded the contract to the Haynes Construction Company, Boston, for the erection of a two-story theater, 75 by 125 feet.

Mr. J. Allen, connected with the Canadian Film Exchange, at Calgary, Ontario, Canada, reports that his corporation is now busy erecting two new theaters, both of which are of the highest type of vaudeville and photoplay houses. The house at Moosejaw, Man., is a $75,000 affair, and will seat 1,200. The house will be right up to the high standard of all the many Allen theaters. The second house is situated at Calgary, and will seat 1,000. When it is understood that Mr. Allen controls nearly a dozen houses in Canada, it is easy to realize that this gentleman is a very busy individual. Mr. P. Kauffman, who is general manager of the Canadian Film Exchange's branch at Toronto, is right hand man to Mr. Allen, and he is reckoned as a particularly able executive.

Mr. Charles Williams is at present operating the Empire Theater, Providence, R. I., as a straight photoplay house and business is not at all bad, the weather considered. The Empire really is owned by Messrs. Spitz and Nathanson, a firm owning a chain of New England theaters, and was leased by them to Mr. Williams. On September first the Empire reverts to its owners, and stock company attractions are to be installed.

The City and Suburban Association of Somerville, Mass., is about to build a one-story building, which will be operated as a moving picture house. No vaudeville will be used, as it is doubtful whether the volume of trade will warrant it.

Mr. Pasquale M. D'Esopo is now building a moving picture theater at Hartford, Conn., which will cost several hundred thousand dollars, but will not operate this house himself, as he has already closed a lease with Mr. S. Z. Poli, the vaudeville and picture magnate.

Mr. James Hodder, of Somerville, Mass., has awarded a contract to Davis, Haines & Davis, of Lynn, Mass., for the erection of a one-story theater with balcony, to cost $40,000. The house will have a seating capacity of 1,200, and the land measures 98 by 110 feet. This house will be up-to-date and will show vaudeville as well as photoplays.

Mr. William Fox, who now has quite a chain of theaters in New England, as well as in New York, announces that he intends to have a real press department for the benefit of his circuit. This scheme will be put into operation September 1.

Mr. F. G. Spencer opened his Unique Theater, St. John, Canada, last week. The Unique has an entirely new front and lobby, and is much improved in appearance. Mr. Spencer now intends to close his Lyric Theater, in order to make some needed improvements and alterations. The new Empire Theater, now building, will be strong competition, which accounts for Mr. Spencer's activity. The Opera House, also a Spencer theater, at St. John, is closed for the season. All these houses show photoplay programs.

The Old Orchard Pier, Old Orchard, Me., has just made a change in its film service, and Mutual pictures are now offered.

Manager Bigley, of the Olympia Theater, Hampton Beach, N. H., reports excellent business at this summer theater. Mr. Bigley is owner, as well as manager of the Olympia Theater, which is a first class house.

Manager Raymond of the various houses controlled by the Gordon banner in and around Boston, is a mighty busy executive, and will be more so, as soon as the new house opens in Scollay Square, Boston. Mr. Raymond, however, has very pleasing results to show for his persistent efforts, and, in fact, some of the new ideas Mr. Raymond has put into operation, have opened the eyes of rival exhibitors.

The Mutual Film Corporation of Canada, reports that the new offices recently opened in Calagry, Alberta, are now going full blast, and that business is assuming goodly proportions. The Mutual program is handled exclusively through this office for the Province of Alberta, and also for Eastern British Columbia. Mr. E. R. Fauser, formerly manager of the Winnipeg office, is in charge, and the address is 408 Leeson-Lineham Block, Calgary, Alberta.

The City Opera House, Biddeford, Maine, is finding business very satisfactory, and will remain open all summer. As an added feature, this theater is now offering Edison's talking pictures, which seem to hit the public quite favorably. The regular picture program is large, and of a good quality.

Balsam's Theater, Biddeford, Me., has closed for the remainder of the summer, but will reopen early in the fall, with the usual programs of photoplays and songs. HENRY.

LOUISVILLE.

THE business of the Louisville exhibitors of picture plays does not seem to have suffered materially from the recent continuous and all but unbroken period of extremely hot weather, although, of course, attendance at the theaters is not what it was during the cooler months. Nearly all the houses have handled a very fair volume of business, however, well-advertised features drawing nicely, and the appearance of old favorites in fitting roles keeping the regulars in attendance in spite of the torrid weather. It may be remarked, however, that the average well-ventilated photoplay house, with electric fans and the absence of glaring and heating lights, is a good deal cooler than almost any other place that could be found during hot weather, and that this is a fact known to those who go regularly. Which may account for the good attendance marked at most of the Louisville houses.

A. F. Mayer, of the Central Film Service Company, announces his decision to make a move into larger fields, notwithstanding the recent increase in the field under his hand, brought about by the consolidation of the Central with the Cincinnati Buckeye Film Exchange, of which he was to manage the Louisville office, as heretofore, and as already announced. With his partner, John B. Simon, Mr. Mayer has found a larger opportunity in the larger city, however, and will therefore leave Louisville about August 10, to start active work on the proposition which he will handle in the Western metropolis. The plan is to operate a string of moving picture theaters through the West, directing them from Chicago, and handling the film service also from that point—a plan by which it is believed exceptionally meritorious programs can be offered to the patrons of the houses in the string. In connection with this business, it is also the plan of the Mayer-Simon combination, and those with whom they will be associated, to handle a vaudeville booking agency. Mr. Mayer states that he has investigated this end of the matter, and believes the opportunity to be exceptionally good. His successor in Louisville has not yet been selected.

The New Grand is the name of a recently opened house in Louisville, at 25th and Montgomery streets, which is a residence district, with no other theater for some distance. P. M. Berger is the name of the owner of the new house, and he secured his equipment from the United American Film Company, of Louisville, including a Simplex machine and opera chairs. Universal service will be used. Mr. Berger also owns a house at Corydon, Ind., a town which is easily accessible from Louisville by trolley, and this theater is also known as the New Grand.

A feature film that is attracting a good deal of attention in Louisville, and will probably be almost as interesting outside the city, is that which was made by the Broadway Amusement Company, of which Joseph Steurle is the head, of the recent Fourth of July celebration, staged by the Louisville Council of the Knights of Columbus in one of the city parks, the central feature of which was a complete detailed and historically accurate reproduction of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the fifty-six signers being impersonated by members of the order. Naturally, Louisville audiences are rather keenly interested in the pictures, as they are able to recognize many of the participants, who are well-known business men. But the film is of no little interest from a historical and patriotic standpoint, as an evidence of a striking "safe and sane" celebration of the national holiday, and as a record of the first known reproduction of the event in question. The film is now making the rounds of the Louisville houses, and will be taken to Boston, Mass., on August 5, for exhibition before the national convention of the Knights of Columbus held there.

A very important announcement in the world of the photoplay, and one reflecting considerable honor upon Louisville, is that of the Kinemacolor Company to the effect that it will establish its Southern office in Louisville, removing it from Cincinnati to the Kentucky Metropolis. The Louisville office will handle all the company's business South of Indianapolis and Columbus, including Cincinnati, and East of the Mississippi, and will be one of the four offices of the company in the whole world, the other three being the one at London, that at New York, which handles the East, and that at Chicago, which covers the West. L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic Amusement Company, and head of the Kentucky organization of exhibitors, will have charge of the Louisville office.

The Morris Airdome, of Jeffersonville, Ind., which has for some time been operated by H. F. Morris, has changed hands, having been acquired by Charles Rose and Morris Cohen. The new owners have renovated the place completely, installing new opera chairs and giving the house a thorough painting, which makes it look like new. The theater will handle four reels a day. Universal service. E. D. CRAIN, JR.

Simplex

a motion picture projector that satisfies.

Every Simplex user is a Simplex booster.

The reason is a simple one. Simplex projectors eliminate all your machine troubles and increase your gate receipts.

What more could you expect of a machine?

All the good points you look for and many you never thought of before you will find in the Simplex.

The Precision Machine Co.

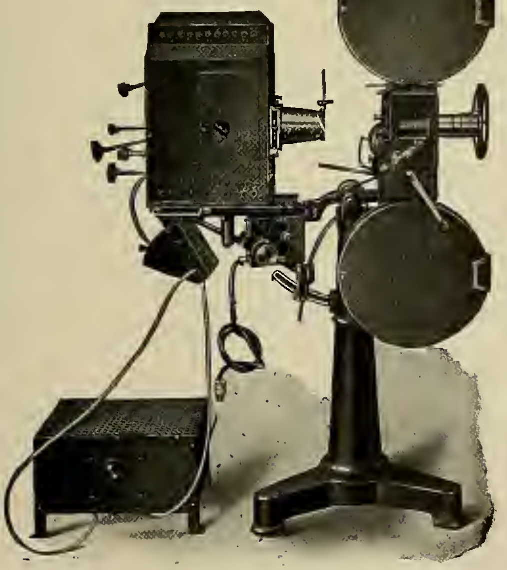
Salina, Kansas.
July 16th, 1913.

Dear Sirs:

I have one of your Simplex machines installed in our Royal Theater, and am more than pleased with the results obtained with it. It has been in constant use for over a year and we have not had to replace one single part in this time. Every little screw and the smallest wearing parts are in perfect condition. When I was in Kansas City over a year ago, I looked the Simplex over carefully and I was a little timid about buying one of these machines, but I took my time and looked the machine over critically and being a judge of good projection machines, I finally decided to put one Simplex machine in our theater in place of a ———, which was practically new.



THE DIFFERENCE IN THE RESULTS OBTAINED WAS WONDERFUL. EVEN MY PATRONS NOTICED THE DIFFERENCE THE VERY FIRST TIME THAT WE USED THIS MACHINE. We have had no trouble whatever with this machine that was due to faulty construction and I am willing to wager that this machine will out-last any machine built, and from its present condition I am sure that as long as I live this same machine will still be in use.

Respectfully yours,
Herbert Thacher,
Manager Royal Theater.

Sirs:

I may say that I am delighted with my Simplex machine. It is a wonder. My receipts have increased 30% over all former business.

Yours truly,
L. Kennedy.

Prepare now for the fall trade by placing an order with your dealer or exchange for a Simplex projector. Write for Catalogue A.

VITAGRAPH.

WHEN THE PRESS SPEAKS (August 11).—The leading "sob-sister" on the Globe, Miss Lizzie Ellison, strongly objects to the love-making between her ward Marion and Danny, the nephew of Professor Peter Gates, the famous woman-hater. Professor Peter, on his part, is equally indignant because Danny wishes to consort with a member of the sex he so greatly despises.

Lizzie is sent out by the editor of the Globe, to get an interview with Gates. She forces herself past the butler into Peter's room, but he makes short work of her and soon has her packing from the house.

Danny, who is in his uncle's house when Lizzie comes in, has heard all that has transpired and makes a proposal to her. "If I can arrange that interview with my uncle for you, may I marry Marion?" As her reputation as a newspaper woman is at stake, Lizzie consents to the proposition.

Danny, who is a member of "The Sons of Mirth," arranges with the boys a little scheme for the subjugation of Peter. They get him to their rooms by inviting him to a supposititious scientific meeting there. Instead of such a meeting he finds himself apparently in a den of anarchists, who put a barrel of gunpowder beneath his chair and a lighted bomb beneath his nose. Lizzie comes in and offers to rescue him if he will grant her the desired interview. Peter is forced to consent, and, as a result, Marion is soon in Danny's arms.

Lizzie receives a great surprise herself when, on her return to the Globe office, she receives a 'phone call from Peter, who proposes marriage to her and tells her not to publish the interview as he has entirely changed his mind about women.

SLIM DRISCOLL, SAMARITAN (August 18).—A notorious burglar, Slim Driscoll, is released after a long term in the penitentiary. He is determined to begin life afresh and to lead an honest career. Bill Blinkers, his mate before he was imprisoned, tells him of a big job that they might pull off together, but Slim will have nothing to do with the proposal. A detective, who knew of his previous connection with Bill Blinkers, and who wishes to find him, asks Slim to betray his hiding place. When Slim refuses to do so, the detective threatens to find a means of getting him back to jail and utterly refuses to believe that Slim wishes to be "on the square." Slim makes up his mind to make one big haul so that he will be able to get away from the country.

The "crib" Slim means to "crack" is the home of John Manners, a police-surgeon, and his wife. Mrs. Manners and her husband have long been on bad terms and on the night that Slim enters the house she writes to her husband saying that she is going to end it all and then takes poison. Slim enters the room where she is lying unconscious on the floor, and stumbles over her body. He sees that she is still alive and, finding the vial of poison by her side, guesses that it is a case of attempted suicide. At once forgetting the danger of his being there, he calls loudly for help. The woman's little child wakes at his call and runs into the room. She tells Slim that the servant is away and that she is quite alone.

Slim at once calls over the 'phone for a police ambulance and does all he can to revive the unfortunate woman. When the police-surgeon enters the room he sees Slim's burglarizing tools and guesses what has happened. He allows him to escape. Slim is filled with gratitude and resolves to keep strictly to the straight and narrow path for the future.

THOSE TROUBLESOME TRESSES (August 19).—Seeing an exhibition of jealousy between a farmer and his wife, the Jones and the Millers start a great argument as to whether man or woman is the more liable to that complaint.

Talking over the matter in the house, the two women plan a trick on their husbands to see whether or not they are jealous. Fake love letters are to be written and posted to themselves. Unfortunately, neither of the ladies notices that the men overhear their talk.

Jones and Miller have a great laugh together and agree to try some of that tricky business themselves. They go to a stable at the rear of their property and manage to get some light and dark colored horse hair. Fastening the hairs to resemble curls, they place them so that their wives will find them and grow suspicious.

At breakfast time the next morning the letters arrive addressed to the ladies. When, after the men have gone to business, Mrs. Jones finds a curl in her husband's coat pocket, she is in despair and rushes to the house of Mrs. Miller to tell her the news. Mrs. Miller is aghast when she hears of Jones' conduct and gives his wife all her sympathy, but congratulates herself that her husband, anyway, is faithful to her. She sings a song of a different tune later on in the morning when she finds a similar curl, of a different color, in an envelope locked in her husband's desk.

The two women resolve to at once go home to their mothers. They are met as they come out of the house by Jones and Miller, who have become afraid of the consequences and have come home to explain things.

BETTER DAYS (August 20).—Leaving their little son, Bobbie, in care of a young maid, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon go off for the day. The maid thinks it a favorable chance to gossip with a friend and leaves Bobbie playing happily on the lawn with some of his toys. While she is gone a tramp comes along to the back door.

Bobbie tells him that everybody is out. When the tramp tells the little fellow that he is hungry and has had nothing to eat all day, Bobbie takes him by the hand and leads him into the house, where he quickly finds some food for him.

When the tramp has eaten, Bobbie invites him into his playroom and exhibits his toys. The tramp is reminded of his own little child, who had died years before. Forgetting the strangeness of his position he plays on with the child all the afternoon and is found there by Mr. and Mrs. Gordon when they return.

Looking through the doorway they see the tramp on the floor with the child's small bank in his arms. Thinking that he is about to rob the child, Gordon is furious and is about to shoot the man when his wife stops him. She shows him that the tramp and the boy are playing together.

Covering the man with his revolver, Gordon enters the room. The tramp tells Gordon and his wife the story of his own wife and child and of how little Bobbie had brought back to him the thought of his younger and better days.

IN AND ABOUT CALCUTTA (August 20).—"The Black Hole of Calcutta," the scene of one of the most horrible incidents of the Indian mutiny; one of the burning "ghats," where the bodies of the faithful Hindus are buried, the curious manner in which the natives prepare their food and many other strange sights are shown in this interesting travel picture of the East.

A MAID OF MANDALAY (August 21).—Seeing Ma May, a beautiful Burmese maiden, cruelly beaten by Gunga Din, her father, Tommy Wilkins interferes on her behalf. He is a British soldier stationed at Mandalay and is aghast at the manner in which the native women are treated. Greatly struck by Ma May's tropical beauty he keeps on the watch for her, hoping some day to meet her again.

He sees her in Rangoon, going to the Shwe Dagon pagoda, said to be the most costly edifice of its kind in the world, where she worships at a shrine of Buddha, praying for help in her troubles. After she leaves the pagoda, Tommy accosts her. Although at first much afraid of him, he is soon able to convince her that he is an honorable soldier and that he means no harm by her. After this meeting he meets her frequently in a beautiful park outside the city and is able to win her love.

His regiment is suddenly ordered back to England and Tommy is obliged to go, not even being able to say goodbye to his pretty Burmese sweetheart.

Back in "dear old London," Tommy has a right good time with the girls and enjoys himself immensely. It soon palls on him, however, for his mind constantly returns to the little park in Burma where he had been used to meeting Ma May. Ma May cannot understand why Tommy stays away from her and visits their favorite seat in the park almost daily, in the hope of meeting him there. At last her expectations are rewarded, for Tommy comes to her from behind and fondly clasps her in his arms.

PLAYING THE PIPERS (August 22).—Alexander McNab and Robert McDonald get into an argument as to which of them is the better player of the pipes. They become very bitter and forbid their respective children, James and Mary, who have been sweethearts from childhood, to speak to one another again.

James manages to arrange a tournament between the two men. He tells McDonald that he will give him a hundred dollars if he can beat his father, providing that McDonald will agree to his marriage with Mary if he is himself beaten.

The tournament is played off in a room over an automobile garage, where James had spent some time previously making arrangements. A tube from the air compressor, used for inflating tires, is led up into his chamber and attached to McNab's bagpipes. Poor McDonald courts apoplexy in his endeavor to compete with McNab's artificial wind and cannot understand his rival's superhuman lung power.

During the contest James remains below regulating the pressure of the air compressor. Suddenly a boy runs in to say that McDonald's house is on fire and James at once rushes off to help, leaving the air compressor to look after itself. A moment or two after he has gone, a chauffeur enters to blow up his tire. He speeds the pressure up to 50 pounds, with the result that McNab's bag bursts and the plot is exposed. Serious trouble is averted by the announcement in the hall above of the fire in McDonald's house. He rushes off to see what he can do, but finds that James has been working vigorously and that he has been able to save much of his property. In gratitude for what he has done, McDonald withdraws his objections to James' marriage with Mary and holds out his hand to his old friend McNab.

THE FEUDISTS (Special—2 parts—August 23).—The Craigs and Smiths, next-door neighbors, are the best of friends until Smith builds a chicken house. Their two gardens are connected and their children fraternize as if all belonged to one large family.

Sidney Craig manages to set loose Smith's chickens, who get into Craig's garden and work havoc among his pet seedlings. Each blames the other's child for the mishap and the war between the two families is on. A spite fence is built between the two gardens, entirely shutting them off from one another, and the children of each family are forbidden to speak to the children of the other.

After a while the two families settle down to a sort of armed neutrality; that is, until Jessie Smith returns from school and Jimmy Craig from college. The two young people are in love with one another and take not the least notice of their parents or of the spite fence. They spoon just the same, erecting ladders and kissing over the garden wall. Their parents discover them and war is immediately renewed.

The last straw is added when a dead cat is exchanged over the wall and a free-for-all fight takes place between the various members of the two families, with the exception of Jessie and Tom. The combat comes to a sudden stop when Tom knocks over Craig's beehives and all are obliged to take refuge in the barn, Tom and Jessie remaining outside and hiding in the cellar until the bees have quieted down.

Tom manages to lock the door of the barn and refuses to release anyone until both Smith and Craig shall agree to his marriage to Jessie. A slight incident in the barn having brought about a reconciliation between the two men, their families follow suit and they emerge to bless the engagement of their children.

EDISON.

STARVED OUT (August 18).—Billie was a very nice young man indeed. Helen thought so. The chaperon started all the trouble. When Billie and the boys came to see Helen and the other girls aboard the houseboat, the chaperon showed the boys very plainly that she liked Herbert Westlake much better than any of them. The chaperon's preference for a millionaire was naturally the cause of some irritation to the boys in their camp near-by. Under the able generalship of Billie they laid plans which eventually resulted in the worthy lady's defeat. On the night following their inhospitable reception the houseboat's dinghy mysteriously disappeared. Next morning when the cook desired to go ashore for provisions no small boat could be found. By swimming ashore, Helen managed to intercept the grocer who visited the boys' camp. Just as she had given him a large order, Billie appeared. Whether it was on account of something he said, or just because of natural buoyancy, it is quite certain that the girls were not nearly as much concerned as the chaperon when the grocer's boat was accidentally upset by one of the boys the next afternoon. With a lingering death apparently staring her in the face, the hungry chaperon was obliged to haul down her colors, or rather to hoist a signal of distress. When Billie came aboard with a heavy lunch basket, she was so glad to see him that she kissed him.

FLOOD TIDE (August 19).—When Sydney Brandon, passing through a little Cornish town on a walking tour, dropped into the Lee household to beg a glass of cold milk, he suddenly discovered that he would much rather stay in that same little Cornish town than continue his journey. For he had become smitten with Connie Lee. Joe Muzzey a short time afterward wished that Brandon were anywhere except in Cornwall.

Brandon met Joe one morning and asked him if the tide came over a certain ledge, from which he particularly wanted to make some sketches. Although he knew that the rising tide would mean almost certain death to anybody upon the ledge in question, Joe assured his arrival that it was perfectly safe.

A few hours later, Connie, worried over Brandon's absence, went down to the shore to look for him. To her horror, she discovered Brandon far below her unable to escape from the rising tide. By a lucky chance, Connie discovered a long rope near by, which she lowered to Brandon. But in his attempts to escape, Brandon had sprained his wrist and he could not climb up the rope unaided. At this crisis Joe Muzzey presented himself to the frantic girl above. He would save Brandon, he said, if she would marry him. Wild with indignation, she refuses him, and finally spurred by the fearful danger of her lover, she slid down the rope herself. Temporarily mad with baffled rage, Muzzey cut the rope. Connie scaled an almost impassable cliff with the disabled Brandon and then the two lovers forgave the delirious Muzzey.

keeps the crowd back and calmly waits until an ambulance arrives on the scene. As a result, the injured person dies from lack of prompt attention. The film proceeds to demonstrate how this matter was called to the attention of Dr. J. M. Force, of the Department of Hygiene of the University of California, and Chief Vollmar, who are responsible for the present state of affairs in the police department of Berkeley.

We are then shown the various methods of helping injured people. A young girl is hurt in an automobile accident. The policeman on his beat is called to a telephone by a signal light; the occurrence and location of the accident is reported to him and he quickly arrives at the scene of the injury. A motorcycle policeman receiving the signal flash is instructed to go after the automobile that caused the accident and we are then shown with what rapidity and speed the injured person is cared for and carried to the city hospital. Finally came the exciting pursuit and capture of the automobile which caused the accident.

BOBBIE'S LONG TROUSERS (August 20).—Bobbie's misfortune all arose from a pair of long trousers. When a boy came into the office arrayed as to the nether part of his anatomy in all the majestic panoply of a grown man, Bobbie's jealousy was aroused. Bobbie invited the girls in the office and some of his other friends to a picnic on the following Saturday, on which occasion he assured them he would wear his first pair of long trousers.

On Saturday, Bobbie's attitude was chiefly characterized by an over-weening pride. When the other boys and girls went in swimming, he preferred to strut about the beach in his lordly apparel until the boisterous demonstrations of his friends forced him to don a bathing suit in self-protection. The fact that he was obliged to resort to personal violence to regain the cherished clothes from a small boy who had put them on in his absence and was grandiloquently stalking about in them, did not in any sense mar what he felt was a thoroughly satisfactory day, and on the following Monday he arrived in the office clad for the first time as a man among men.

But poor Bobbie found that being a man among men has certain disadvantages. The girls in the office wouldn't let him kiss them any more. Instead they treated him politely and held him off at arm's length. So Bobbie decided there was nothing else to do and went back to short trousers.

THE MYSTERY OF WEST SEDGWICK (Special—2 parts—August 22).—When Herbert Burroughs, a young detective, met Fleming Stone in the boot-blacking stand of the Metropole, and when the great detective showed the younger man how he could deduct the salient characteristics of the owner of a pair of muddy shoes which were waiting to be cleaned, neither of the men dreamed that this trivial incident would play a decisive part in clearing an innocent man accused of a terrible crime.

That very morning Burroughs was called to investigate the murder of one of New York's greatest financiers, Joseph Crawford, who had been shot through the head as he sat at his desk in the private office of his country estate. A gold bag, which was found lying on the desk beside the dead man, pointed a terrible finger of accusation against Florence Lloyd, Crawford's niece, who was known to have quarreled with her uncle immediately before his death. A careful search of the premises resulted in the discovery of several puzzling clues by the young detective. There were two faded rose leaves, for instance, a transfer slip, an evening newspaper, and last but by no means least, a card tucked away in the lining of the gold bag. A mysterious network seemed to envelop the Crawford household in the ghastly mystery from the beautiful Miss Lloyd, and Philip Crawford, the dead man's brother, down to Gregory Hall, Crawford's secretary, Elsa, the upstairs' maid, and Louis, the butler. By careful plodding work, Burroughs succeeded in unwinding the tangled skein, until at last he found himself confronted by an apparently insoluble knot. His investigations were brought to a standstill by the mysterious silence of Gregory Hall, the secretary. Despite the heavy load of circumstantial evidence which pointed to him as the actual criminal, Hall merely shrugged his shoulders and refused to say the few words which would clear him. How Burroughs confessed himself beaten and called in Fleming Stone; how the great detective forced the unwilling Hall to prove an alibi for himself and finally how the murderer was discovered, lack of space forbids us to tell.

A PROPOSAL FROM THE SPANISH DON—Being the second story of "Who Will Marry Mary?" (August 23).—The Don was handsome, so naturally Mary liked him. He was a charming companion for a cross-country ride, and she liked his nicely modulated accents. In addition to her other charms, Mary had a very canny strain of common sense. She knew that a great many people would be glad to marry her, and that a great many other people would be still more glad to marry her money, and she did not intend to choose anyone until she felt quite sure what she was doing. The Don proposed to Mary twice—once aboard Mrs. Reed's yacht, and later on the train which was taking the house party West to inspect Mary's mining property. Whatever he may have thought of her first reception of his ardent vows, her behavior on the train clearly showed him that she would not marry him. Frenzied with rage at the thought that the girl had been merely playing with him, the Don succeeded in uncoupling Mary's private car from the rear of the train, near the top of a long grade.

Luckily Captain Justin Bradford, U. S. A., had chanced to meet the Don and hear his insane ravings as he sat drinking in the smoking car. He was too late to prevent the Don's nefarious scheme of revenge, but managed to jump aboard Mary's car.

The car started backward down the grade while Bradford strained every muscle at the brakes. The brakes were rusty, and did not hold well, and consequently the car was within two feet of an open drawbridge when he at last succeeded in stopping it. The last scene shows the captain standing at a little wayside station watching Mary as she waves to him from the rapidly disappearing train.

MARY'S TEMPTATION (August 18).—Mary Wilmer lives on the outskirts of a rural village. She is the sole support of her mother, and her seven-year-old son, a cripple. She works in a country store. Her salary is small. There is a secret in Mary's life—her husband is serving a prison sentence. This causes the villagers to snub Mary. Only one champions her cause, the new manager of the store where Mary works. He secretly loves her. Mary reads of the wonders performed by a famous surgeon and takes the boy to him. He agrees to cure him, but the figure asked is far beyond Mary's means. Mary is brought into constant temptation by the sight of money in the store. One evening she returns to find the drawer containing a large sum of money. She takes it. William Rogers, the manager, sees the theft. At home that night she proceeds to go through the nightly spelling lesson with her crippled son. The little fellow places the speller in her lap, points to a word and asks her what it is. Mary looks at the speller. The word before her spells "thief." She resolves to replace the money. As she prepares to return to the office she does not know that she has been watched through the window by her husband. He has escaped from prison and fled for protection to his home. As Mary leaves the house he confronts her. He tells her he must have money. She denies that she has any. He tears the money from her and continues his flight. Before he has proceeded far he is shot down and killed by prison guards. Rogers, lingering at the office, hears the shots and runs to the river bank to investigate. He finds a rowboat drawn up containing Joe's dead body, the stolen bills clutched in his hand. Mary runs through the group of villagers and comes face to face with her dead husband. As she falls at his side her eyes fall upon the stolen bills. The villagers naturally suppose the escaped convict to be the thief. Rogers does not disillusion them, but takes Mary home and marries her.

BLACK BEAUTY (August 19).—The station agent in a small town is the sole support of her mother. Tom Lenox, the young sheriff, is an admirer. One of Laura's possessions is Black Beauty, a horse. The doctor tells Laura that her mother will die unless she is taken to the seashore. Tom again offers himself, but is refused. A few days later, Laura receives a telegram notifying her that a certain train must not be stopped because it is carrying a shipment of gold. Mexican Pete, an outlaw, sees the message and decides to hold up the train. He takes Laura by surprise, binds her to a post and sets the semaphore to stop the train. He overlooks a whistle which Laura wears around her neck, and with it she summons Black Beauty, who breaks out of the stable and to the assistance of her mistress. At Laura's direction Black Beauty changes the semaphore just in the nick of time and the train rushes past without stopping. Black Beauty then unties Laura's bonds and carries her to safety.

THE BURNING RIVET (Special—2 parts—August 21).—Mayor Weltman has taken his first false step under the guidance of a political boss, Dan Sullivan, but refuses to be a further party to the crooked deals of the Sullivan crowd. Sullivan holds papers concerning Weltman's misstep over the latter's head. Weltman takes a stand in the matter. Weltman's son, Harry, is in love with Sullivan's daughter, Margaret, and Sullivan tells Weltman that he will wreck his son's romance. Weltman makes a clean breast of the matter and Harry stands by his father. Sullivan prepares to make good his threat and calls up the city editor of the "Transept" and bids him send a reporter for the story exposing the mayor. The editor, scenting a big story, sends his star man, Tom Gaynor, not knowing Gaynor to be a friend of the mayor's son. Gaynor learns of the details from Sullivan and does his best to dissuade him. Sullivan, who is half drunk, grows abusive and in order to help his friends, Gaynor decides to handle the story and do what he can to avert its publication. In giving his editor the facts he tries to get him not to make public the matter, but the editor refuses.

Margaret is greatly agitated by the news, but tells Harry he is doing right and that she will stand by him. Sullivan enters and Margaret tries to appeal to him, but he won't listen. He turns on Harry, telling him he will send his father to jail. Sullivan and his crowd drink in preparation of their victory. Harry tells his father there is but one way left and before his father can interfere he leaves for Sullivan's office bent on getting the papers if he has to steal them. Sullivan at his office opens his office window for air. It is high above the ground and he half drunkenly watches some rivet workers on a big structural building nearby who are throwing red hot rivets from one floor to the other. Harry is seen to enter Sullivan's office by the janitor, but deciding it is none of his business, goes on with his work. Sullivan surmises what Harry is there for and points to the safe as he opens it, telling him the papers are there. Harry fearing his drunken abuse will be heard by others, leaves. Sullivan locks the door, takes another drink and placing his feet on the desk, doses off. Harry meanwhile has walked off down the street. A red hot rivet thrown by the riveters misses its mark, hits a structural beam and falls through Sullivan's open window beside a waste paper basket. Fire soon envelops the room and consumes the papers in the safe. When Sullivan stupidly awakens he is cut off. Harry returning meets a crowd at the office door on the street and from Gaynor learns of Sullivan's tragic death. He makes the statement that he was with him but a short while before. That is overheard by Sullivan's henchmen and they decide to make an accusation against the mayor by accusing his son of Sullivan's murder, and forcing an immediate trial. Gaynor stops the article accusing the mayor when the gang would force the editor to run an article accusing Harry of Sullivan's murder. Gaynor refuses to write it and is fired. Margaret, now becoming owner of the paper through her father's death, tells Gaynor she will make him editor if he will find evidence to clear Harry. Gaynor discovers the rivet, and at the coroner's inquest clears Harry. The new editor's first copy is the marriage notice of Harry and Margaret.

SMASHING TIME (August 22).—Bess Travers makes a hit at a ball with one of the new slipper watches. Cordelia, her colored maid, admires it very much. When she is invited to the grand ball of "The Full Moons" she decides that she will have a slipper watch. She sees a great reduction in dollar watches they are selling for 59 cents. So she gets one and makes herself a slipper. She goes to the ball and is admired by all of the coons. This annoys Bella, another colored belle, who has been the hit of the room with her new necklace. After Cordelia arrives Bella is not in it. Bella, wild with jealousy, gets her best fellow, Rastus, to tread upon Cordelia's foot and smash the watch, promising that she will love him forever. Rastus carries out his part of the plot. After the police clear the hall, Bella and Cordelia fight it out all over again. Next morning Cordelia is a sight, but she tells Miss Travers that she had a perfectly lovely time.

THE RAG BAG (August 22).—A rag man calling up the alleys for trade disturbs the slumbers of two tramps. They awaken. They are very angry and determined to be revenged. They find that the rag man has left his bag outside of a gate. They take the bag to a freight yard, where they decide that the smaller of the two shall get into the bag and cover himself with rags while the larger tramp will take the bag to a junkman and sell it. Then when the opportunity offers the little fellow is to cut the bag with a knife and escape. All goes well and the bag is accordingly sold and the big tramp forgetting his companion goes into a saloon to enjoy himself. In the meantime the rag man has come out of the gate, and, seeing that his bag is gone, starts in pursuit. He proceeds to the junk yard, where the bag with the little tramp inside is still on the scales. When the rag man questions the junk man the bag starts to move. They become alarmed and start to kick the bag along the street. The bag is later opened and the tramp captured.

THE TENDERFOOT HERO (August 23).—Tom Milford, foreman of the Hayden ranch, and Sylvia Hayden, daughter of the ranch owner, are in love. Hayden has been notified that Archie Hollister, son of an old friend in the East, is coming to visit the ranch. Just before Hollister arrives, a cowboy brings word to the ranch that Simms, a troublesome neighbor, has been illegally interfering with the ranch supply of water. Hayden and Milford ride out to stop Simms and have a quarrel with him. Meanwhile Hollister, the tenderfoot, arrives carrying a bulldog. Later it develops that Simms is engaged in selling ammunition across the border to Mexican revolutionists. He learns that the authorities suspect him and thinking to divert suspicion from himself and at the same time get revenge on Milford, he conceals a box of ammunition in Milford's bunk house and sends an anonymous letter to the sheriff, suggesting that a search of the bunk house will disclose important evidence. Milford is taken in custody when the ammuntion is found in his quarters. Before things have gone very far Hollister, whom the cowboys have been joking and hazing, discovers that Simms is the real culprit and causes his arrest and reunites the lovers.

THE FLIGHT OF THE CROW (Special—2 parts—August 11).—Old Morgan, an eccentric millionaire in a Western city, has a dissipated young son. He has also a very sweet adopted daughter, Edwina. One day the son is waylaid near the railroad yards, stripped of a big "roll" and thrown unconscious into a box car. He finally emerges from the box car two hundred miles away, dazed and lonely. He drifts into a hobo camp, and in time joins the order of tramps. He becomes the most famous of them all and is known as "The Crow." Old Morgan provides in his will that in case the son can be located within a certain time of his (the father's) death, the bulk of the fortune shall go to him, but if he is not found, it shall be divided between Edwina and the lawyer who handles Morgan's business. Edwina is in love with a young man named Chester Thompson. She makes her marriage to him conditional on his finding her brother for her. He gets a tip from an article in a paper that "The Crow" is none other than the brother, and he himself dresses as a tramp and starts out to find him. The lawyer, in the meantime, learning the conditions of the will, makes every effort to keep the brother from being found, and hires detectives to thwart Edwina and her lover at every turn. The lover eventually succeeds in his quest, however, and everything ends happily for all save the avaricious lawyer.

TOBIAS TURNS THE TABLES (August 19).—The recruit of the U. S. Infantry, Tobias Yoskum, incurs the displeasure of his colonel by poor showing at drill, and he is given hard labor until he decides that he can and will master military movements. The colonel's wife is herself a shrew, follows up her consort's dislike to Tobias, when he is placed in humiliating service in the colonel's house. While there, he encounters the maid, and forms an attraction which culminates in a kiss. Just about this time the mistress appears on the scene—the colonel is informed, and Tobias, now truly "in bad," is escorted to the guardhouse. Following this, the maid, with feminine inconsistency, declares that the kiss did not materially damage her—that she almost liked it—and now regrets her hasty action in screaming and calling the attention of her mistress to the contribution.

Tobias is released and when on guard duty, finds opportunity to get back at the colonel's wife by arresting her for using a camera on military reservation, which unknown to her, is against orders. Tobias refuses to swerve from his sworn duty and places the colonel's wife in the guardhouse. This is all done during the absence of the colonel, and the shrewish one is obliged to remain imprisoned for hours. When he hears the news on returning, he is in a fine frame of mind to appreciate the humor of the situation. When she gets her freedom, she instantly demands that Tobias be scalped alive; but the colonel has suddenly taken a great liking to the raw recruit, who has improved in his eyes, so he lets him go scot free.

THE TEN THOUSAND DOLLAR TOE (August 20).—In order to divert the attention of Jerry, a young man dependent upon his rich aunt for money, from the painted females upon whom he is squandering his allowance and also to help him recognize the superior virtues of Jane, a sensible young girl taking the Kneipp cure, the aunt and Jane conspire and take an imprint of the V-shaped scar on the big toe of Jane's right foot. They show this to the young man, and the aunt makes the stipulation that if he is able to find the original toe from which the imprint was made within a week, that he will be allowed $10,000 a year. Jerry is delighted, and at once comes to the conclusion that it is the secretary to his aunt who has the scar. But he soon learns to the contrary when he receives an imprint of the young lady's toe from the maid.

The next morning he discovers two charming young girls with his aunt, and still conjecturing that the owner of the scarred toe must be one of his aunt's friends, he follows one of the young ladies to a chiropodist where, after a great deal of trouble, he manages to get an imprint of the young lady's toe. Again he is disappointed. The next morning he follows the other young girl to a shoe store, where he pretends to be a clerk. After tearing a hole in the young girl's stocking and getting an imprint of the toe, he sees that he has again failed. He tries to get imprints of the toes of the three other young ladies at his aunt's house, but each time meets with a failure and gets hurt himself. It is Saturday morning and Jerry's time is drawing to a close: but just at the last minute of the eleventh hour, Jane, pretending that her foot is asleep, asks Jerry to rub it for her. He does and in so doing learns that she is the owner of the scarred toe. They make a bee line to the aunt's house.

FATE FASHIONS A LETTER (August 21).—Detective Rand is assigned to search for Slick Jim, a notorious thief who has recently escaped from the penitentiary. Mrs. Rand, left alone in her home during his absence, writes a letter to him, telling him of a certain payment of money to be made her on the following day. While she is engaged in this wifely task, a man who claims to be Deputy City Assessor, calls and asks to inventory the personal effects in the house. Although she is the wife of a smooth detective, he cunningly gets her out of the room and manages to read the letter that she has inadvertently left on the table. This letter follows Rand to another city and is accidentally burned before he has an opportunity to peruse it. The unburned portion of the missive, however, has a thrilling appeal from the wife, begging the husband to hurry home, as she is in imminent danger. He rushes to the telephone and finds the wires dead. His train is late as a result of a storm. Desperate, he hires an auto, and starts for home, forty miles away, arriving just in time to capture the bogus assessor, who is about to rob Mrs. Rand. When he tears the disguise from the villain's face, he proves to be Slick Jim, the escaped convict that he was hunting in another city—so he adds a new charge to that one as an incorrigible criminal.

THE GOOD INDIAN (August 22).—A frontier doctor gets a night call, but regrets leaving his young wife alone in their exposed shack. She insists that he accept the service, so he loads up a revolver and leaves another for her and goes on his mission of mercy and medicine. He has hardly got well away before the young woman looking up discovers to her alarm, the face of an Indian peering through the window. She is reassured, however, of his friendly intention and he begs her to come immediately to his tepee, as his child is dying. She gathers from him the nature of the complaint, takes some medicine, picks up the gun and goes with him and applies herself so assiduously to the task that she saves the life of the child. In the interim her husband returns, finds her gone and starts on the search, eventually rounding her up at the tepee. The Indian is very grateful for their service and offers them his choicest treasures, which they refuse, but accept his friendship. Some time later, there is an Indian uprising—the cabin of the doctor is burned and he and his wife are in imminent danger when the Indian they defended comes to the rescue, takes them to his own tepee an sees that they are protected and restored to comfort.

BREAKING INTO THE BIG LEAGUE (Special—2 parts—August 20).—An air of excitement pervades the little town of Squashville. The local baseball team is to cross bats with the determined organization from Stringtown and the game will decide the season's championship. Mamie Wallace, an ardent enthusiast, appears on the field with her father and greets her sweetheart, Montjoy Jones, who, resplendent in his uniform, assures his friends that Squashville will capture the pennant. It is a hotly contested game and as the final inning approaches Squashville has a lead of three runs. The local pitcher wavers momentarily and the visitors fill the bases. Now comes the crucial moment. A high fly is driven toward Montjoy, who makes a terrible muff and loses the game and the championship.

Montjoy becomes a stranger in his own town. His friends desert him and no one has a kind word. The love of his sweetheart turns cold and her father forbids the disgraced player from entering the house. The outcast seeks the solace of sleep and has a wonderful dream. He plays the game again. This time he catches the fly and retires the side. He is acclaimed the hero of the hour. It happens that a scout for the New York Giants witnesses the game and wires to Manager John McGraw, who has his team in training at Marlin, Texas. Acting upon the scout's advices, McGraw sends a contract to Jones, who loses no time in preparing to join the team. Squashville gives its "first citizen" a rousing send-off. At Marlin Montjoy reports to McGraw and meets the famous veterans who have brought two championships to New York. McGraw and Mathewson, the peerless pitcher, take the recruit in hand. He has a severe lesson in sliding and McGraw shows him how to bat. Mathewson's fast curves put the young fellow on his mettle. After the training season the team goes to New York for the first game of the season. Montjoy has shown such skill with the bat that he is sent in a "pinch hitter" and knocks out a home run, which clinches the game for the Giants.

Modestly he submits to an interview and news of his fame reaches the home town. Mamie and her father determine to see the famous star in action and make a trip to New York. It is a spirited game that the Wallaces witness. One sensational play follows another and finally the great Mathewson is called up to replace a weakening pitcher. A hit off the famous twirler causes alarm. Mathewson sees an opportunity to work an extraordinary play and confers with Montjoy, who has been sent to the shortstop position. The result is a lightning triple play. Again Montjoy is the hero. As he passes one of the boxes he sees Mamie applauding him. What a pleasure it is to pass by and ignore her! And then he wakes up. The stern reality of his position strikes home as he sees a note thrust under the door. The note is from Mamie, stating that after much persuasion she has prevailed upon her father to permit Montjoy to call, but father has declared that if baseball is mentioned, the player will have to "beat it." Monty throws bat and glove into the street and hastens to his sweetheart's home.

THE SUBSTITUTE ENGINEER (August 18).—Billy and Tom are rivals for the hand of Rose, the waitress at the railroad lunch counter. They are both up for examination for engineer and it is tacitly understood that Rose will favor the one who first gets his engine. Matters are precipitated when Billy receives notice of his appointment and Tom learns that he has failed. Tom, in a rage, attacks Billy, but is pulled away by the bystanders. Billy hastens to inform Rose of his success.

Later when the engineer of Number Six is taken ill, Billy is called upon to substitute. Tom sees a train order instructing Number Six to wait at Belmont until eleven fifty for Number Seventy-three. Here is his opportunity for revenge. While Billy puts on his overalls Tom steals his watch and sets

H. J. STREYCKMANS ANNOUNCES

"The Last Days of Pompeii"

(No State Rights for Sale)

GENUINE DRAMATIZATION of Lord Bulwer Lytton's Masterpiece, in Nine Reels, staged at Pompeii and Turin, Italy. This production is without question the most sensational and spectacular artistic film ever conceived, costing hundreds of thousands of dollars. We have paid more for the exclusive rights to America for this film than has ever been expended for the entire production of any other subject. The conflagration was staged during one of the most violent eruptions of Mt. Vesuvius, and the burning of the City of Pompeii in connection with the flaming volcano presents an awe-inspiring spectacle. And this is merely an incident in the film, in which are shown

100 LIONS AND TIGERS

3000 PEOPLE 50 GLADIATORS

The leading parts are acted by the foremost artists of Europe; expert swordsmen are seen in thrilling encounters, and daring men risk their lives in the dens of raging beasts and in death-defying chariot races.

"THE BETROTHED"

Is the first of a series of Six-Reel Superb Productions, and is dramatized from A. Manzoni's masterpiece, "Promessi Sposi," recognized as Italy's greatest literary work. This film is it ten minutes ahead. As he replaces it Rose discovers him, but does not suspect what he is doing at the time. Later Number Six crashes toward Seventy-three at a terrific speed. A terrible wreck is imminent.

Two tramps see a suitcase drop from a touring car. They open it and to their disgust find nothing but a few inexpensive articles and a pair of field glasses. While gazing through the glasses curiously they see the two trains approaching. They dash frantically in opposite directions and flag the trains just in time to prevent a collision.

At the station a message from the Belmont operator tells of the impending tragedy. Tom's peculiar actions and Rose's suspicions lead to his apprehension and arrest.

ECLIPSE.

THE CLOWN'S REVENGE (Special—2 parts—August 19).—Because a clown was bitterly upbraided for making love to his wife, an acrobat suffers death. With her child dying, the little woman of the circus continues her thrilling feats on trapeze and rings, and, when she retires to her dressing room, is insulted by one of the clowns. Her husband enters and a bitter argument follows, in which the clown leaves, swearing vengeance on the man. When the child dies, he is the first to hear of it and hurries to the acrobat with the gruesome news. The latter is about to perform his "Leap for Life," but the information of his son's death unnerves him. He misses his leap and crashes on his skull to the floor.

BIOGRAPH.

THE SUFFRAGETTE MINSTRELS (August 18).—Two wives of Jenksville at least did not intend their husbands should be corrupted by the arrival of these enticing ladies in town. That show should be investigated. It resulted in their becoming one of the sensations of the performance, while the husbands became an awful example.

FATHER'S CHICKEN DINNER (August 18).—The publisher wrote Ferdinand to change his story and kill the old man on his arrival. Then father came to town. He read the note. In the kitchen Ferdinand was preparing a chicken dinner, where a live chicken refused to be cooked. Father believed the worst and summoned the police, which enabled the chief to test his new method of putting speed into cops.

THE WORK HABIT (August 21).—After a lifetime of hard work, Dad consents to live with his married daughter in the city. The young couple try to make him forget work. Ill at ease under his enforced idleness, he makes a deal with a disabled old street cleaner to keep his job. Finding him out, the young folks give in, and it's "back to the farm" for Dad.

TWO MEN OF THE DESERT (August 23).—Off for the gold lands, the partners let the coin decide who shall first ask the all important question. On the return the successful one meets with an accident. The other reports his death and rests in his stolen happiness until the other, the long dread fever over, returns his homeward way.

PATHEPLAY.

Ranelagh, England.—On the occasion of Children's Day, organized by the princely family of Teck, grown-ups play polo on donkeys for the entertainment of the kiddies.

Editorial Section.—St. John's Gild is doing an immense amount of good in maintaining the floating hospital "Helen C. Juliard," in the waters of New York Harbor to afford relief to the sick children of the poor of New York.

NAPOLEON WHIFFLES, ESQ. (August 19).—Whiffles' sweetheart, who idolizes the great Napoleon, is forever pleading with Whiffles to emulate the general's example. One day Whiffles dreams he is the famous Corsican. After reviewing the grand army, Napoleon Whiffles jumps into a taxi and hurries his forces to the assault at the pyramids. For his assistance the taxi driver is decorated with the Legion of Honor.

Dr. Ditmars, curator of reptiles in the New York Zoo, whose ability in this direction is unquestioned. The snakes that are deadly are shown and their characteristics pointed out and the harmless snakes are accounted for in the same manner. The information furnished is reliable and at the same time of intense interest. A little animal inhabiting India, the mongoose, is the enemy of all snakes and afraid of none. The film culminates with a picture showing the little fellow in a bitter and exciting struggle to prove his mastery of a reptile that has challenged him.

AUTO POLO—THE NEW THRILLER (August 20).—The newest dare-devil fame which has taken the public by storm is the novel subject of this film. There are four autos engaged in the game and these cars sweep about the field after the ball at a speed that is alarming, the mallet men seeming regardless of their danger in their efforts to win, leaning perilously out of the car for a stroke while it turns on two wheels, stops, races backward across the field at a speed that will make the hair stand on end while only watching it.

STUNG! (August 21).—An inn-keeper who has the money for the rent tells the landlord that he hasn't, because he, the inn-keeper, wants to chance the kale on a prizefight. After the landlord has gone, the inn-keeper flashes his roll. A tramp tries to lift it. The hotelman lifts the tramp under the chin and then runs for the sheriff. The sheriff meanwhile is coming to arrest the inn-keeper on the landlord's complaint of non-payment of rent. The sheriff and the landlord find the tramp, who swears that the hotel man has robbed him. The sheriff continues his search for the inn-keeper. While the bar is unwatched the tramp drinks his fill at the bar and then departs on the back of a donkey. He falls asleep and, after wandering around for a while, the donkey comes home to the inn. The sheriff has compelled the hotel-keeper to pay his rent and when the tramp comes back the inn-keeper wakes him up and the tramp gets stung, believe us.

THE LIZARD (August 22).—This film treats the common little animal known as the lizard in a manner that leaves none of its characteristics unexplained. The order is divided into twenty-one families, with over 1600 species, but the specimens used to illustrate this educational picture are the commonest of the tribe and, therefore, the most interesting to the average man. The lizard is tracked to its native haunt, a tuft of grass in a quiet glade, and followed on a hunt for its breakfast. It meets with a caterpillar, its favorite dish. Many of these little reptiles are trained, which can easily be done, and become great pets. It proves its value as an assistant to the farmer when it uses its sharp claws to climb trees, where it plays havoc with the small insects which annually destroy millions of dollars' worth of vegetation.

A VISIT TO THE RUINS OF POMPEII (August 22).—A tour of the ancient city buried by the ashes of Vesuvius in A. D. 79 is the subject of the latter half of this reel. Recent scientific excavation has brought the buried city to light and the spectator is enabled to gaze with wonderment on the curious sights which this phenomena occasioned. Everything within the city remains and only the natives are gone; in the interior a bakehouse is seen, where the mills are ready to grind the grain and the oven awaits the fagots; the vats used by a dyer remain intact and the villas behold their gardens blossoming again. This film is unquestionably the happiest combination of entertainment and education ever devised and is bound to please.

THE MEXICAN GAMBLER (August 23).—Clara Eldridge is the apple of her father's eye and the real ruler of his extensive ranch. One of the boys employed by her father is in love with Clara and his attentions are as welcome as the flowers in May. Everything goes well for the young people until Eldridge is double-crossed by a Mexican gambler, who swindles the rancher with the aid of a confederate. Eldridge must pay a debt, but has no money with which to meet it. He requests a loan of the Mexican and the latter agrees provided Eldridge will help him win Clara's love. The father agrees and after explaining the situation to his daughter she submits her heart. She leaves with the Mexican for a parson's and while she is gone Eldridge learns of the swindle by which he lost his money. Led by Clara's young lover, a posse find the Mexican and justice is meted out to him in a manner that provides a novel punch.

ESSANAY.

THE WHIP HAND (August 19).—"It is better to have loved and lost, than never to have loved at all," but the heart throbs and pain of it all, would make one believe that it is better never to have loved, than to have loved and lost. Jim Dowling loved a pretty, demure girl and was rewarded by losing her. "The Whip Hand" is a beautiful love drama filled with pathos and exciting situations, taken in the heart of God's country, among the hills and dales of Ithaca, N. Y.

THE ACCIDENTAL BANDIT (August 20).—Jim Carrigan receives a letter from his friend, Frank Moore, requesting that Jim send him his hunting outfit, as he is going hunting with the boys. Jim decks out Charles, his hoob farm hand, with the hunting paraphernalia to deliver to Frank. The funny incidents that happen and the side-splitting contortions that Charles goes through, will please the most sedate and exacting audience.

MAKING HAY WITH MODERN MACHINERY (August 20).—This instructive picture shows how hay is made and shipped in bales.

THE SHERIFF OF COCHISE (August 21).—George Clayton with his accomplice, steals two horses. When Robert Hines, the ranch owner, discovers his loss the following morning, he becomes incensed and decides he will put a stop to horse stealing in his vicinity, so he offers a large reward for the capture of the men. He writes to the sheriff of the adjoining town for his help in capturing the thieves. The astoundingly clever way in which the sheriff accomplished the capture is interesting in the extreme.

BRONCHO BILLY'S MISTAKE (August 23).——Broncho Billy, a woodsman, living in northern Montana, is greeted by Paul Harding, an artist from New York City. Harding presents Broncho Billy with a letter of introduction. The newcomer is taken into the rough Western home and is told to make his headquarters there until he has finished with his painting. Harding sees in Broncho Billy's wife, an excellent subject for oils, and is given consent to paint her portrait. Harding takes a deep interest in the woman and not only teaches her how to read and write, but gives her a thorough knowledge of worldly things in general. Some time later, Harding receives a telegram demanding that he return to his home immediately, that his mother is critically ill. Broncho Billy's wife takes Harding to the railroad station in their buggy. Broncho gets wind of his wife driving away with Harding, and comes to the untimely conclusion that she is eloping with the artist. Harding is overtaken by Broncho Billy and a fierce struggle ensues. Things are straightened out to the satisfaction of Broncho Billy when his wife explains the true situation. The men shake hands and promise to be friends always.

THE POWER OF CONSCIENCE (Special—2 parts—August 22).—Bryon Waters, a mine foreman, writes his mother and brother, the Rev. Stanley Waters, that he is going to pay them a visit shortly. We then see Bryon checking the time of the miners as they are leaving the mine at the end of their day's work. Hale, a miner, accosts Dora Gordon, the sweetheart of Bryon, who sees the assault and whips the masher. At the home of Dora, Bryon is ordered from the premises by her father, who says that his daughter is too young to be thinking of marriage and that when she has attained a marriageable age she is to marry the man of his choice—Edward Hale. This admonition and dismissal by farmer Gordon is witnessed by Hale in the distance, who rejoices in the discomfiture of Bryon. In order to put a stop to the stealing of his chickens, farmer Gordon places a shotgun in back of the door of the chicken house, with a string running from the trigger of the gun to the door knob. Hale discovers the secret hiding-place for the letters between Bryon and Dora and in reply to a letter that Bryon had written to Dora, telling her that as he is going away for a few days he would like to see her before his departure, he forges a letter in Dora's handwriting to Bryon to meet her in the chicken-house at 10 o'clock that night. Bryon finds the note and in going to the chicken-house is shot. The noise brings Dora and her father to the spot. Dora finds the note, but tells her father that she knows nothing of it.

Upon being notified of his brother's death, the Rev. Stanley goes to the village, where he begins to ferret out the murderer. As he has reason to believe that Hale is the murderer of his brother, the minister preaches a sermon on "The Power of Conscience," which is directed by that reverend gentleman to Hale, who reluctantly consented to hear the sermon. After the sermon, Hale sees a vision of the murdered man wherever he goes, and the next day, as he is working in the mine, the vision comes to him. To better observe the illusion he strikes a match. The coal gas is ignited and there is an explosion, which brings the villagers to the scene of disaster. Among the multitude is the Rev. Stanley, who rushes into the burning mine. He later returns with the prostrate form of Hale, who, on his death-bed, confesses that it was his fault that Bryon met his untimely end.

THE GHOST (August 22).—A country house has the reputation of being haunted. Two boys are frightened away by a thief who pretends to be a ghost. He has made the place a receptacle for the Remington diamonds, which he and his pals have stolen. They are waiting for the affair to blow over, so that they can remove their plunder in safety. Jim, a young man of the village, is in love with Gertrude, but her father, Howard, withholds his consent to their marriage until Jim shall have made some money. Jim hears the boys' tale of the ghost, and laughs at it, and Reed, a smart young chap, offers to bet Jim ten dollars that he dare not spend the night in the haunted house. Jim takes the bet and goes to the house. Reed tells Gertrude what Jim has done and she is greatly concerned. She appeals to her father to go and induce Jim to abandon his plan; he refuses, and Gertrude goes alone. The thief, who has fallen asleep in the house, is wakened by Jim's entrance. Jim overcomes him, and takes away the Remington diamonds. But the other members of the gang arrive, and Jim is compelled to escape to an upper room. The gang follows, but is delayed by the necessity of breaking down the intervening doors. By means of a fireplace and a chimney Jim reaches the roof. The thieves return to the ground, and begin shooting at him. Meanwhile Gertrude has reached the house, discovered Jim's peril and has gone for help. She returns with the constable and some armed villagers. They find Jim crouched behind the chimney, seeking shelter from the shots of the gangsters, who are surprised and captured. Afterward Jim receives a reward of five thousand dollars for the return of the Remington diamonds, and Howard withdraws his objection to Jim's marriage to Gertrude.

A GREATER INFLUENCE (August 19).—Bob Graham, out on a shooting trip in the Maine woods accidentally shoots himself. He is found and cared for by Norah, a pretty girl, who takes him to her home and nurses him back to health. After his recovery, he leaves for the city, his mother having arrived to bring him home. Despite a strong attachment that has grown between the young couple they are separated. Norah later leaves for the city and takes position as housemaid to the Grantleys. Bob and his mother visit the Grantleys and Bob and Norah, to their surprise meet again. After dinner, Dick, the handsome son of the Grantley household, excuses himself and goes into the library to smoke. There he finds Norah and forces his attentions on her. Bob comes into the room just as Dick forces Norah to kiss him, and Bob knocks him down. The commotion is heard and all hands enter the library, among them Bob's mother. Bob sticks up for and defends Norah, but to no avail, and she is given her notice. Bob's mother, fearful of the great attachment between her son and the housemaid, sends her a letter offering her a pittance if she would promise never to see Bob again. She returns the money and Bob arrives just in time to see her leave the house. He hastily follows her and requests an explanation for her tears. She shows him the letter and assures him that her love is away above any amount his mother could ever give her. Bob, convinced that social relations were of no importance where the greater influence of love is concerned, takes Norah to a minister and they are married.

CAUGHT IN THE ACT (August 24).—Dr. Brown, a dentist, is called away to attend a patient and leaves his wife in charge of his office. Jim Slick, a sneak thief, sees him leave and plans to rob him during his absence. Tying a handkerchief around his face, and pretending a toothache, he enters the house and asks for the doctor. The doctor's wife asks him to wait in the office. As soon as she goes, he starts working at the combination of the safe and almost succeeds in opening it, when the telephone rings and he is interrupted. Mrs. Brown comes in and sees him getting up from his work at the safe and realizes that the patient is a thief. He complains of the pain in his tooth and she says that she will alleviate it. She puts him into the chair and then revolves it at terrific speed. He becomes dizzy and she phones for the police. She keeps swinging the chair around until Jim is unable to move. She leaves the room for a moment and Jim succeeds in stopping the chair and runs out of the house. There he meets a policeman, who stops him. He tells the cop that he is the dentist and that there is a woman thief in his office. The policeman goes in and places Mrs. Brown under arrest. He is just about to take her off to the police station, handcuffed when the dentist returns and explains that the prisoner is his wife and she is liberated.

HYPNOTIZED (August 24).—Willie loves Grace, she is admired by Tom and Jack. Willie is exceedingly jealous of the other two and tries in some way to get them out of his way. He attends a show given by a hypnotist in the town hall and sees how he puts people to sleep and how he makes them do whatever he wills them to. He decides to hire him and to have him work on his rivals. He brings him to the girl's house and there they meet Tom and Jack. The hypnotist works on Tom and Jack and tell them that they are bulldogs, with the result that they act as such, much to Grace's confusion and the amusement of a great crowd. Willie then introduces the professor to Grace and he becomes attentive to her. She seems to favor his attentions and Willie again becomes jealous. He quarrels with the professor, who hypnotizes Willie into believing that he is a monkey. He runs from out the house on his hands and knees and is chased up a tree by a boy with a stick. Meantime Tom and Jack have recovered from the spell and have a fight. They meet Willie, who is returning to the house, also recovered. They enter and find the hypnotist in full possession of Grace. They decide that it is useless to fight among themselves while the man with the mysterious power is their rival, and make up, leaving the battle for the girl until such time as their chances are even.

POWERS.

THE LITTLE SKIPPER (August 20).—Old Captain Hardson, tired of seafaring, sells his ship, the Liza Ann, intending to give the money to his two children, Robert and Alice. Alice is in love with Phil, a young fisherman, and the father threatens her with disinheritance unless she marries the man of his choice. Alice refuses and quietly marries Phil. The old captain sends her from him, telling her she will never get any of his money.

Some years later an old shipmate and friend of the captain dies, leaving his fortune of some $20,000 to the captain. In the meantime, Robert has married Margaret, a society belle. The captain determines to pay them a visit before giving his fortune to his son and departs for their home. Arriving there, he receives a very chilly welcome from his daughter-in-law, who sniffs at his pipe and is shocked by his manners. The captain, on one of his visits to the old wharf, meets two old cronies and invites them home to lunch with him. They reach his son's home, to find Robert and Margaret impatiently waiting. She becomes speechless with rage when the captain invites the two cronies to sit down at the table with them and passes the grog. She commands her husband to order them out, and leaves the table. Robert, fearing his wife's anger, does as he is bid, and the old captain and his friends leave.

They wander down to the beach, and, while the two old cronies are commiserating with the captain, he suddenly sees a little boy playing in the water, who, in attempting to rescue his toy sailboat, has overreached and struggles in the deeper water. The captain rescues the little fellow at his own peril and when he brings him to the shore and hands the boy over to the anxious mother, who has come down to look for the lad, he discovers in her his own daughter, Alice. A happy re-union and reconciliation is brought about and the captain writes to his son Robert, telling him he has decided to "dock" with Alice and Phil and give his "cargo" of $40,000 to the little skipper.

THE SEA URCHIN (August 22).—On the edge of a rocky coast, a little girl, lashed to a mast and sole survivor of a wreck far out at sea, is washed ashore. "Barnacle" Ben, the hunchback—a silent, gloomy fisherman, sees her from a distance and rescues her. He takes the child to his cabin, where she soon revives in front of the fire, but is too confused and frightened to tell him of the wreck.

Time goes on and ten years later the girl has become the light of the old hunchback's life. His devotion is untiring, and because of her gratitude to the hunchback, she promises to marry him. All goes well until the "stranger," a stalwart young fisherman, comes to the fishing village in search of work. No help is needed in the village, but he is directed to "Barnacle's" cabin. There he applies for and is given a job by the hunchback.

On the way up the hill to the cabin the stranger meets the girl coming down. Both, mutually attracted, exchange a lingering look. The girl then continues on her way to the village, and is surprised and pleased upon her reutrn to find that the hunchback has hired the good-looking stranger. In time the attraction between the two ripens into love; and while out on the rocks, drying her nets, the boy takes the girl in his arms and asks her to marry him. At first she confesses she loves him. Then, remembering her promise to the hunchback, she draws suddenly away from him, and in spite of the boy's protests, tells him she will keep her word and marry the hunchback, as she owes him her life. "Barnacle" Ben, from the house, sees the girl in the stranger's arms, hurries down to the rocks, faces him angrily and indicates with his knife that he will kill him if he ever again speaks of love to the girl, reminding him she is already promised.

In the meantime the girl has returned to the house and is surprised and frightened at the surly attitude of the men when they return. The next day, fearing trouble between them, she resolves to accompany them on their fishing trip. She jumps into the boat at the last minute and the three go out to sea. Later she falls asleep in the boat, and the stranger takes off his coat and covers her. The hunchback throws the coat roughly away and places his own over the sleeping girl. The stranger resents this; both men get into an argument and start to fight. The girl awakens. Frightened, she tries to stop the fight as the boat rocks perilously. They do not heed her. The boat tips and the girl is thrown into the water. The men, still fighting, do not hear her cries for help. Night has come down, and as the men struggle nearer the edge of the boat, they are thrown overboard. They cannot find the girl and swim ceaselessly through the night searching for her.

At last as the dawn comes, the stranger worn out with the fruitless search, falls on to the beach exhausted. The village people work over him and revive him. The hunchback, still swimming, discovers the girl on a big rock, where the waves have thrown her. He rescues her, more dead than alive, and swims with her back to the shore. The village people see the two coming up the beach and welcome the lost girl, the stranger taking her thankfully in his arms. The hunchback stands apart forgotten by all, and, as he watches the girl and the boy, he suddenly realizes what they mean to each other, and makes up his mind to efface himself. Taking his bag over his shoulder, he wends his way over the hill and out of their lives.

THE IRON TRAIL (2 parts—August 12).—William Clifford, the new railroad construction foreman, arrives from the East to superintend the construction of the Santa Fe Railroad upon its first invasion of the West. He arrives at a time when the Indians are on the verge of an uprising—incensed at the intrusion of the iron monster, which drives away wild game and kills their people. Sly Fox, the young Indian chief, whose brother is killed by the construction train, visits the construction camp and threatens to exterminate the crew unless they cease further work. Alarmed at this attitude, Clifford sends for Crandall, the superintendent. Crandall, upon receiving the news, immediately starts for the construction camp and on the way meets with an accident. Fearing the injury may prove fatal, he sends for his wife and daughter.

In the meantime, Sly Fox, who is in love with Starlight, a beautiful Indian maid, tries to force her to his will and threatens her with death unless she consents. He is prevented from killing her by the timely arrival of Clifford, who is out inspecting the new road. With the assistance of several cowboys, who are on their way to the camp with a herd of horses for construction work, Sly Fox is taken prisoner. One of the cowboys volunteers to take Sly Fox to the fort, while the rest continue their way to the construction camp with the horses.

Hawanna, who is in love with Sly Fox, with Indian cunning succeeds in shooting the cowboy and liberating Sly Fox. Enraged at the white man's interference, Sly Fox returns to the Indian camp and incites the tribe to an attack on the white men, with the purpose of driving them away. Starlight, who has overheard their plans, rides out to warn the white men.

She first rides to the construction camp, where they make immediate preparations for defense, and have barely succeeded in getting on the train, with the intention of leaving camp, when the Indians attack. The Indians follow the train out, and a running fight ensues. The engineer is shot, and as he falls with his hand on the lever, stops the train. Clifford goes forward to take his place, and before the train is again started, the Indians succeed in setting fire to the box car, in which Crandall, his wife and daughter are secreted. The explosives used in construction work are also contained in the box car, and when the fire is finally discovered, the train is brought to a stop. Crandall and his family are taken out, and the box car is uncoupled, and just as the train starts away from it, a terrific explosion follows.

In the meantime, Starlight has ridden to the garrison and also to the neighboring ranch and notified the soldiers and the cowboys that the Indians are on the warpath and attacking the construction crew. They immediately start out, meeting on the road, and finding the construction camp deserted, follow the path of the track and come to the timely rescue of the party just as the Indians have them completely at their mercy. Starlight, who has followed with the cowboys, is wounded in the skirmish. When she regains consciousness, she attempts to crawl to safety across the railroad tracks, but falls exhausted on the tracks just as the train comes along on its way back to the camp. Clifford sees her from the engine. He crawls out on the tender of the engine, and just as the train nears her, lifts Starlight to safety.

menced and left his daughter his blessing and $200 that he got from the sale of a book. The poor orphan hunted up an employment agency. About this same time the parent was wishing that he could control the tomboy, who liked to throw apples at all sorts of things, himself included. The parent decided upon a governess as the only possible solution of the tomboy's disposition. He wired the employment agency for one. The parent had been a customer and the lady boss of the employment bureau is loath to disappoint him. He specifies an elderly woman and she offers the post to the only available old maid. But the proffer is rejected with scorn.

The neglected orphan suggests that she has the education necessary and can impersonate an aged woman. The lady boss clutches at the straw and off to the ranch is packed the poor orphan, now rich in the promise of $25 a month, with room and board free. The tomboy is much incensed at her presence and mistreats her shamefully, but eventually the orphan wins her over and becomes her confidante. This puts the "grand high kibosh" on the governess stuff and the parent sees that his idea is not the right one after all. What the tomboy really needs, he thinks, is a mother. He asks the orphan to be one to her, but the orphan has seen the parent actually being cruel to the unwelcome suitor and she decides will not take the risk just yet of incurring his displeasure. Putting off an answer, she agrees to help the tomboy wed the unwelcome suitor, who is not a bit unwelcome to the tomboy. She has determined that her usefulness is ended and has vague thoughts of resigning, a decision which is crystallized into actual effort when the parent catches her false hair and discovers she is really not as old as she looks. But fond persuasions prevail at the last and the parent agrees to become the charming husband to the orphan, and dear old dad to the tomboy and the unwelcome suitor, now no longer unwelcome.

THE EYES OF THE GOD OF FRIENDSHIP (August 23).—It was on the far southwestern frontier that Joe and Jack became fast friends. It was under the same condition that their friendship prospered as their acres grew in number and their cattle in fatness. Tom it was who found the Indian ruins and persuaded them to dig there with him. Tom it was who told them that the ancient image they discovered represented to the Indian mind. He said it was the God of Friendship and the books bore him out. This being the case, it was but naturally that the three friends should swear friendship upon the image and each wear on a chain about his neck one of its ruby eyes.

Tom's time in the West came to an end all too soon for the ranchmen; but their down heartedness did not prevent them from extending hospitality to the gambler Clinton, when he came shouting at the corral gate. Food and drink for himself and his horse were freely given, as freely accepted and a card game arranged for his entertainment. But not heeding the splendid hospitality showered upon him by his hosts, Clinton must needs find fault with a card Joe held. The quarrel grew and when it was ended Joe was unconscious from a blow over his head and Jack was dying from a bullet wound. Clinton took the rubies from about their necks and fled. He caught a freight train east even as Joe, returning to consciousness, was vowing vengeance upon his friend's ruthless slayer. Time went by. Joe sent the checks for half the ranch proceeds to Enid, Jack's sister, each month, but no clue came. Meanwhile prospering upon the money he had won in the West, Clinton returned to Blakeville, where Enid was attending a seminary. He met her and pressed a clandestine but innocent flirtation. Enid went home to visit Margaret, Tom's sister, when vacation time had come and Clinton followed her. He saw her much and at last won her consent to marry him. Instead of a ring he gave her one of the rubies he had taken from the ranch friends long before.

But wrong brings its own punishment with it, and Tom chanced to see the ruby, still strung on its long cabin as in the days when he had got them back from the jeweler and he and the Western pardners had worn them. Life in the West had taught Tom the value of a closed mouth, so he only wired Joe that Enid had the ruby. A clue was enough for the sharp-witted fellow, made sharper by a desire to see his friend's murderer brought to book. Joe got himself appointed a deputy sheriff there where warrants and requisition papers issued and he went east to visit Tom. Clinton came, the talk was twisted to rubies, and Enid innocently displayed the one Clinton had given her. Both Tom and Joe identified it and presently Mr. Clinton found himself arrested and bound west to a prompt trial, while Tom found it easier to press his suit for the hand of his sister's pretty visitor than it had been while the artful ex-gambler was around.

REX.

THE HARVEST OF FLAME (2 parts—August 21).—The factory owner's daughter, Pauline, is engaged to the young inspector of factories. At the opening of the story the factory owner is given notice that on the morrow his factory will be inspected as to safety appliances and compliance with the city fire laws. He, knowing that his factory is painfully deficient, endeavors that evening to bribe the young inspector when the latter calls on Pauline. The inspector very quietly refuses the bribe.

The next morning when the inspector comes to the factory the owner tells him that unless a favorable report is made, the engagement of the inspector to Pauline will be broken. The young man is considerably tempted; but when comparing the safety of the lives of hundreds of girls and the happiness of two young people—himself and his fiancée—his conscience will not permit him to hand in any but a truthful report. The owner tenders the inspector the engagement ring, which he accepts, and leaves.

The young foreman of the factory is an inveterate cigarette smoker, and, although he has been severely reprimanded on several occasions by his employer, persists in his habit, irrespective of orders. He is just about to light a cigarette when the factory owner, coming from his office, where he has just left Pauline in tears, interrupts him. The foreman drops the flaming match and hides his cigarette. The factory owner goes out on a short errand and in the meantime the match has started a flame of fire in the scraps and cuttings in one of the finishing rooms that the foreman is unable to put out, and, as the factory owner returns, he finds the factory in flames, most of his employees safe, but he realizes that his daughter is trapped in the office behind the wall of flame. In the meantime the foreman has run out and sent in an alarm to the fire department. He meets the inspector and the two return to the scene of the fire. The factory owner apprised them of Pauline's whereabouts in the burning building, and the foreman, realizing that he has been the cause of it, slinks away. The inspector attempts to go through the door, but is driven back by the flames, and at this point, looking up, sees Pauline silhouetted in the window against the roaring flames. At this window is only a coil of rope—the only means of escape. He climbs the rope, lifts Pauline on to his shoulders, and climbs down safely to the ground, where they are met by the frenzied father, who receives them with open arms, while the foreman, with grim determination, eschews the further use of cigarettes.

JUST IN TIME (August 24).—The services of Detective Lyons are engaged by a prominent railroad to stop, if possible, the dynamiting outrages that have followed unfair demands, resulting in destroying several of the company's bridges. During the interview between the president and Lyons, a note comes mysteriously to their presence, warning the Company to come to immediate terms or expect further disaster. Manifesting their sincerity of purpose by stating that the round house will be blown up at twelve o'clock. Lyons glances hurriedly at his watch, which registers twelve. A moment later the explosion is heard and the round house is seen in ruins. They hurriedly enter an auto and are driven to the scene of the calamity, where Lyons carefully examines the structure of a remnant from the infernal machine.

Mack, the dynamiter, is seen to enter his room and tell his companion tool of his success. A later notice, received in a mysterious way, demands that the president's wife use her influence with her husband in behalf of the strikers, calling to her notice that disaster would befall her should she fail. The family immediately prepare to leave the city by a special train.

In the meantime, Lyons, having successfully traced the purchasing place of a certain cog used in the construction of the machine, follows his clue further, which leads him to a nearby hotel, where Mack is quartered with his tool. Lyons engages the adjoining room and upon first opportunity, wires a dictaphone beneath Mack's bed to record all conversation in the next room. The dynamiters, having secured information of the leave of the president's family, lay plans to destroy the bridge as the special passes. They discuss the matter and this is recorded by the dictaphone, and the "tool" departs, with dynamite in his suit case. The plot is overheard by Lyons, who is suddenly surprised by the confrontment of another "tool," who has become aware of the dictaphone by an accident. The two men struggle near the telephone, the receiver of which is knocked from its holder by Lyons. This causes a natural response from the office. Assistance is sent to Lyons and the "tool" is taken away, a prisoner. The detective sets off to baffle the efforts of the dynamiters.

The "tool" is seen to enter a fast motorboat and set off under full speed to fulfill the outrage against the president's family. Lyons is seen in hurried communication over the telephone with the president, whom he instructs to hold the special. The traffic manager is called and they immediately telegraph to a way station. The operator wires back, "Too late—she has gone by." Great excitement prevails in the president's office and an engine is ordered for pursuit. The operator at the way station, upon learning the vital character of his message, hails a passing racing auto, hurriedly explains the situation to the driver and they set off to overtake the special. The dynamiters are seen to timely arrive and plant their mines beneath the bridge. The president and Lyons, together with his secretary, are seen to enter the engine and set off at full speed. The racing auto gradually crawls up on the special. After an exciting chase they succeed in reaching a position opposite engine and signal. The engineer immediately responds by drawing the special to a halt at the edge of the bridge. The dynamiters blow the bridge and hurriedly leave in the motorboat as the president's family descends from the rear of the train, where they are met by Lyons, the president and his secretary, they having arrived upon the engine.

IN SEARCH OF QUIET (August 21).—Robert Morton, a popular young novelist, is unable to finish a novel he is working on because of the amount of noise made by the erection of a new building next door, and hastily departs for an old hunting lodge in the mountains that he has owned for some time. He absent-mindedly neglects to make any arrangement for food or supplies on his arrival, and lands at the lodge hot, dirty and dusty from a long tramp from the railroad station in the nearby village. Unknown to him, the entire county is in terror because of an escaped convict. To complicate matters, a young girl has been using the lodge as a daily reading and lounging place. Morton has brought some shabby but comfortable old clothes for his stay while finishing his book, and dressed in them, meets the girl. He is ravenous for food by this time, and promptly requests her to tell him where he can obtain food in the neighborhood. He also tells her that he does not wish to be disturbed by callers. She jumps to the romantic conclusion that he is the convict, and, partly for fear of his supposedly desperate character, and partly for pity and admiration for his youth and appearance, agrees to supply him daily with food. He soon finds out that the girl believes him to be the criminal, and for amusement, plays the role for her benefit until finally she brings him money and her father's automobile and clothes to make an escape. He enters into the spirit of the affair, thinking to laugh over the matter later. But, unfortunately, the real convict enters into the situation, and steals both girl and the car in an effort to get out of the country and across to Canada. It is only after a mad chase after the auto by the novelist on a motorcycle, and a daring leap into the flying car from the motorcycle that the convict is overcome and the girl's life saved. The novelist has now finished his book, but finds he has a new plot to work upon, and a most charming character to develop, and an undoubted love story ahead of him, in which the little girl who was so anxious to save him fits as the heroine.

THE STATUE (August 23).—Mrs. Swell visits the studio of a young sculptor and purchases a life-size statue of Gladiator tableau. The young artist, fearing that his customer may change her mind, hurriedly engages the services of Mike and Jake, two expressmen of unusual eccentricities, to convey the costly statue to the home of his customer. After carefully instructing the expressman in the handling of the statue, the inexperienced handlers of art fall over the tableau and hopelessly destroy it. The artist, pressed for the need of money, goes into a frenzy and is only pacified by the possible chance of replacing the tableau by the two expressmen in statue pose. Mike and Jake, in sympathy, offer their services and are immediately posed for the final inspection by Mr. Swell, who is forced to question his state of mind by the various positions assumed by the Gladiators at different intervals of his inspection. However, he complies with his wife's desire, and gives orders for its immediate delivery.

Mike and Jake are crated in statue form and suffer to endure rough usage enroute to the Swells' residence. Upon arrival they are met by the artist, who uncrates and poses the expressmen in the well-kept grounds of his purchaser. A lawn party is given in celebration of the magnificent unshrouding of the statue and wine and food are plentifully spread before the half-famished statues. At last the temptation becomes unbearable, and to the surprise of the entire party, the bold Gladiators invade the feast and take their fill, bringing about the exposure of the young sculptor, whose art they had so greatly appraised. At the police station their voices are raised in protest, but to no avail, and another scene shows these three serving a like number of years in the rock pile.

THE MAID OF THE MOUNTAINS (August 18).—In the heart of the Blue Ridge Mountains of Kentucky, Jim Rutland, a moonshiner, his wife and their daughter, Mary, live a happy and unrestricted life. A young mining engineer, Harvey Bryce, whose interests have carried him into the mountains, happens upon the home of Rutland, where he is received in a courteous, although suspicious manner. Mary, the daughter, is naturally attracted by Bryce, and a certain alliance is effected between the house of Rutland and the stranger from the outer world.

One day, while in search of a trout stream, Bryce accidentally discovers a whiskey still, and is immediately endangered through the suspicions of the moonshiners, which now seems confirmed. One of their men, who had been detailed to watch Bryce, reports the discovery and the moonshiners set out to effect their customary reception to revenue officers.

Upon arrival at the house, they find the young engineer making an honorable proposal for the hand of Mary. His errand to the mountains is made evident by communications on his person, and to the satisfaction of all. Rutland's house becomes his home. Bryce's proceeds are ample for all and their distillery is no longer required as part of their livelihood.

Motion Picture Rectifier Set Front View

Better Light for Your Machine

The first requirement of good projection is a powerful steady light.

An arc lamp using direct current from a G-E Rectifier gives the finest light that can be obtained. The light is powerful and does not flicker like the light of an alternating current arc.

The G-E Rectifier not only improves the quality of the light, but at the same time it reduces the cost for current, because the rectifier furnishes current at the exact voltage needed by the lamp. Losses in rheostats are therefore entirely eliminated.

WHEN THE BLOOD CALLS (August 20).—A miner, Shaw, with his wife and little boy, Jim, is working a claim in the Sioux country. Jim crawls into the tunnel while his father is at work and falls asleep. A band of Sioux attacks the miner's cabin, and when he goes to rescue his wife, the Indians kill the father and mother and burn the cabin. Later, Jim comes out, finds the bodies of his parents, and after burying them as best he can, wanders away. He is found in the woods by little Mona, the daughter of Chief Long Knife, and takes him to the camp. Mona takes a fancy to little Jim, and the chief adopts him. Jim forgets his white ancestry, and becomes, to all appearances, an Indian, with their customs and manners. Ten years pass, and Jim and Mona, now grown, are sweethearts. By killing his first bear unaided, he wins his first eagle feather. He is taught the prowess of a chief, and is looking forward to some great deed by which he may win the right to wear a war bonnet. A fort has been established in the region, and the colonel's daughter, against advice, goes alone for a ride. She is captured by Long Knife's band and taken to his camp. There she is tied to a tree, and the chief tells Jim that here is his chance to win his war bonnet. Here is a pale face for him to torture to death. Jim is elated at his opportunity and advances to begin the torture. As he is about to strike, his forgotten childhood comes back to him, and he remembers that he and this captive are of the same blood. His Indian training battles with his racial sympathy, but the blood call is too strong and he refuses to torture Alice. The Indians accuse him of being a coward, with the heart of a squaw. They condemn him to wear a squaw's dress and be treated as one. He is made to do squaw's work. Mona's love keeps her faithful to him in spite of his humiliation. Together, they conspire to get Alice away. Jim is sent for water. He slips away and goes to the fort. Arriving at the fort, he tells the anxious colonel of his daughter's fate, and leads the soldiers back toward the camp. When near to it, he tells them to wait and slips back into camp with the water he was sent for. The squaws beat him for his long delay, and Mona protects him.

Jim and Mona go to the tepee where Alice is confined. Alice and Mona change clothes, and Jim ties Mona where Alice was. Jim and Alice slip away, but are seen by a squaw, who tells Long Knife his daughter is with the despised coward. Long Knife sends his braves after them, and the Indians and soldiers meet. The Indians are forced to retreat and when they report the result to Long Knife, he rushes to the tepee and stabs Mona (thinking it is Alice) in revenge. When he discovers his mistake, Long Knife stabs himself.

Jim, accompanied by Alice and the colonel, return to get Mona, and finds her dying. He carries her out of the tepee. Mona dies, after bidding Alice and Jim farewell. They bury her according to Indian custom, and at her grave the colonel asks Jim to return to the fort with Alice and himself. But Jim, true to his love for Mona, refuses, preferring death where she lies.

SOME RUNNER (August 23).—Eddie is entered to run in a race to be held on the following day; and his backer, who has bet $10,000 on his winning, urges Eddie to retire early. Eddie sets his alarm clock and "turns in" to get the needful sleep. Eddie is a sound sleeper, and the warning of "Big Ben" the next morning, that it is time for him to get up, fails to rouse him. The ringing of the alarm simply disturbs him somewhat, and he turns over and sleeps more soundly than ever. He dreams a beautiful dream of responding promptly to the alarm and starting out for the race course. There he leisurely takes his place with the rest of the runners, and starts out after them. On the way, in passing along the street, he hears cries for help and stops to investigate. He dashes into the house from whence they issue, knocks the villain down and rushes out with the girl. The girl is grateful and tells him he has won her heart. Eddie is susceptible and proposes. The girl accepts and consents to an immediate marriage. They repair to a clothing store, where Eddie buys a suit of clothes, and from thence they immediately go to a justice of the peace and are married. He then takes her to their new home, where he leaves her to finish the race.

In the meantime the runners have passed the seven-mile post, and Eddie's backer is frantically looking for him. The checkers tell him he has not passed, but suddenly in the distance they see him coming on and he runs by like a flash.

Eddie overtakes the other runners, and on the road is stopped by a butler, who tells him of several masked men having kidnapped his master and stolen a sack of gold. He implores Eddie to rescue the old man and tells him the direction the kidnapper's auto took. Eddie pursues in another auto and overtakes the kidnappers, rescues the old man and his gold. He takes the old man back to his home and receives the bag of gold as a reward. Eddie again goes back to continue the race.

The runners by this time have passed the fifteen-mile post and his backer has said good-bye to his $10,000 bet. When within a mile from the finish, Eddie is again seen coming on like a whirlwind and wins the race. Amid cheers and cries, the crowd lift him and bear him away on their shoulders.

And then—Eddie is rudely awakened by his backer, who comes in to tell him the race is over.

WHEN CUPID WON (August 23).—James Warner and William Martin are neighbor ranchers who have had some difficulty regarding cattle trespassing, the former possessing a young son and the latter an attractive daughter. Between the two children an intimate and mutual attraction prevails, the nature of which is highly opposed by their respective, although somewhat eccentric parents. At the opening of the story, Mr. Warner is expecting the arrival of a well-to-do country lady, whom he has taken unto himself to match with his son, Fred. The lady arrives and proves rather eccentric. Mr. Warner immediately sets out with his prospective daughter-in-law to find his son, whom he discovers at a distance making violent love to his neighbor's daughter. Indignantly he sets off in their direction. In the meantime Mr. Martin has been entertaining his favorite choice for a son-in-law upon the ranch house steps. The latter having mustered sufficient courage through occasional gulps of cider, asks his host for his daughter's hand. Martin, having looked forward to this proposal, shows marked favor and the prospective bride's health is toasted. As Mr. Martin drains his cider his eyes become suddenly fixed in the distance upon the ardent lovers. Excusing himself he sets forth hurriedly to investigate. The two parents simultaneously reach the scene of their offspring and indignantly lead them off by the ear. Fred is later presented to the lady of his father's choice, Miss Simpkins, who proceeds to show immediate fondness for Fred. The latter gently but firmly resents her advances. Several alternating scenes show a similar condition in the home of his sweetheart, until at last, provoked by the earnest endeavor of their parents, the young lovers plan an elopement. A carriage is secured and they leave for a neighboring town to wed.

Their absence being quickly detected causes a general alarm in the two households. Both parents and their favorites bent upon the same mission, join forces, and unsolicited shares the carriage of Dr. Skinner, which he is shown to vacate for a professional call a short time prior to the action. Bess and Fred, having noted their pursuit in the doctor's vehicle, reach the town in advance and post a reward at postoffice for the arrest of occupants of Dr. Skinner's vehicle for theft. A scene is shown where the doctor in pursuit of his carriage is overtaken by the minister, who shares his vehicle and both drive off hurriedly. The reward sign having come to the notice of a village constable, immediately prompts him for action. In the meantime, Fred and Bess call upon the minister and learn of his absence. The pursuers are shown to arrive and are promptly placed under arrest by the constable and conveyed, under violent protest, to the town lockup, while Fred and Bess ride off to find the minister, whom they succeed in encountering a short distance from the village. With the doctor as witness, the marriage is immediately performed and Fred and Bess hurriedly precede the party to the village and visit the lockup. Several instances are shown of prison life, in which an intimacy springs up between the respective choice of Warner and Martin, to the general dissatisfaction of both parents. The newly made bride and groom eventually appear and offer as terms of release the forgiveness and blessing of their parents, which are reluctantly accepted. The minister arrives upon the scene with Dr. Skinner and is immediately called upon to read a second marriage ceremony for Miss Simpkins and Jim Withers.

ECLAIR.

13 AT TABLE (August 24).—A superstitious party, afraid of the bugbear thirteen, is unable to shake the hoodoo, and in despair foregoes the tempting dinner. Mrs. Viola, who is giving the party for little Clara's birthday, is horrified at finding thirteen covers laid. She invites an attic poet to make the emergency fourteenth. Meanwhile Uncle Hiram telegraphs he cannot come. So there are still but thirteen. The guests refuse to sit down until the poet is dismissed. Then, one of the servants may not leave the room, for there would still be thirteen.

But Uncle comes after all. Still thirteen. All leave the room. He enjoys the dinner. The poet is again sent for. He is out, so Clara scrawls a message. Uncle leaves. The guests seat themselves. Lo, the poet enters. Again thirteen. They again retire in the greatest dismay. This time the poet will not be deprived. Aided by a two-day-old appetite, he makes short work of the heaped-up dainties, and bombards the other guests with wishbones and bon-bons as they watch him hungrily from the doorway.

SEA WORMS (August 24).—Revealed by the most powerful of magnifiers, sea worms—considered among the most curious of marine fauna—prove to be intensely interesting physical phenomena. The different species live in the sand, among the seaweed, and even attached to fishes. The sand species is commonly used as bait of fishermen. The hereids, an elongated species composed of numerous rings, has two pairs of horns and a similar number of eyes. Another variety, the sipeneles, lives in water or sand, and has a vast, trumpet-shaped mouth. The aphroditae bristle with strong, silky, iridescent hairs. The branchellions, which live in colonies attached to their prey by strong suckers, are so hardy as to remain undisturbed even by the powerful undulations of their most common victim, the electric eel.

THE BEATEN PATH (3 parts—August 20).—Two refined gentlemen, Randolph Thorne and G. E. Lacelles Hall, are neighbors. They quarrel over the dividing line of their estates, Thorne flaunting a paper in the faces of Hall and his son, Arnold, which he says will prove that he is right in his contention. The reaction of the argument has a detrimental effect upon Hall, and his son determines to purloin the paper. That night as he is stealing it, he is seen by Thorne, who follows him to his home. Hall, feeling that he is to blame for his son's predicament, offers himself to be arrested, and he is led away to prison. His incarceration brings on an illness that has its sequel in death. This causes a great deal of suffering to two innocent young people—Chester Thorne, who did much to have his father take less drastic measures, and Barbara, the beautiful unworldly daughter of Lacelles Hall, who had not long been home from school. The action of Thorne also drove Caspar Black, the betrothed of Barbara away, and also determined the brother of Barbara to go to the Northwest to forget the occurrence.

It was many years after the death of her father before Barbara ventured outside of her own house. One day her maid, 'Laura, persuaded her to take a little exercise by playing tennis, and as she was about to throw the ball to Laura, the unresponsive muscles of her arm deviated the course of the ball and it hit Randolph Thorne in the eye as he sat reading for the hundredth time the Thorne diary dating back to 1600. She recovered the ball, apologized and Chester, having caught a glimpse of her, determined to meet her again. When she returned to her home, a vision of Chester appeared before her, begging her to throw away the Hall diary, which dates back to 1700, and seek happiness. She threw the book out of the window and it fell in front of Chester who happened to be passing. He picked it up. Barbara came down and in his confused state he handed her his family diary. Each read the other's diary with interest and as the days went on Barbara, with a vengeance in her heart for the death of her father, encouraged Chester. Some time later Chester invited her to a dance, where she was denounced as a convict's daughter by Caspar Black. Chester went to her aid, but she proclaimed his father as being the instigator of her family's troubles. Leaving his side she ran directly into Black, who fell down the stairs and was killed. In order to reflect the crime in his direction Chester threw his card and glove beside the dead man. He left for the West, where death overcame him in a forest fire, while in the East death also claimed Barbara.

SOUL TO SOUL (2 parts—July 30).—Deciding to take a long delayed rest, Jack Cave, a successful young business man, leaves his aged mother and goes to a country place, where he is welcomed by Fenton, the hotelkeeper, and his daughter Lila. Having had very little experience with women, Jack quickly falls in love with Lila. Shortly afterward they are married and Jack learns to his displeasure that his wife is an inveterate flirt. One morning he catches Paoli, the village sport, kissing his wife. He chastises him and sends him away, but Paoli returns, and, engaged in a game of cards with Fenton, he lies and is killed by Fenton's blow. Father and daughter try to conceal the body, but the police find it. After interviewing the Fentons, the police are led to believe that Jack committed the crime out of jealousy. His arrest not only causes the death of his mother, but drives him temporarily insane.

HOW ABOUT A WEEKLY SERVICE?

WANTED

Publicity man and good correspondent of undoubted ability and A-1 references. Knowledge of Feature Film business desirable but not necessary. State age, experience, salary and other particulars in first letter. Address L. E. F. Co., care of Moving Picture World, New York City.

who has been working on evidence that will acquit Jack, finally obtains it. Upon his release Jack goes at once to the Feotons. His only determination is to be vindicated. This he finally accomplishes when his wife, unable to stand the penetrating gaze of his eyes which is constantly thrown upon her, confesses to the police that her father had committed the murder.

GREASE PAINT INDIANS (August 3).—The Uncle Sam Moving Picture Company, which is located in Oklahoma, is at work on Indian pictures. A French company touring the United States fixes up Pawnee as a good location for just that same sort of work, and stops off there.

Neither company knew of the other, but each spied a bulletin board in front of the local newspaper office, which gave warning that the Indians were on the warpath. Both companies, made up as grease paint Indians, mistake each other for a band of real Indians. The actors are panic-stricken and make ludicrous efforts to escape to safety. However, they discover the real situation and join in the fun heartily when the laugh is turned on them.

THE HOLY CITIES OF JAPAN (August 3).—Dream of the most exquisite fairy city your mind can conjure up, all toned in silver-gray and rose—and your dream will be like unto the exquisite City of Hatsiisi, which has in its midst the sumptuous mausoleums of the Tonkongavian dynasty. It is of this city—also known as Nikko—that the Japanese say: "He who has not seen Nikko, cannot say 'marvelous.' "

Nearby Nara, centered with a shimmering lake of silver, is the cradle of the Japanese monarchy. Its Temple of the Lanterns with a sanctuary gallery, are far-famed works of architecture. These and the fountain of "The Roe" draw thousands of pilgrims there from all parts of the country.

CLARA'S MYSTERIOUS TOYS (August 10).—Little Clara Horton, "the Eclair Kid," is shown in the rainy-day pastime of cutting up paper into bits. Tiring of this, Clara throws a handful into the air. The pieces automatically gather toward a common center, and marshal themselves about into a toy aeroplane, which takes flights as easily as though controlled at the helm. As this fades, more bits thrown up by the child form into a box of colors which weave themselves into many pretty designs that culminate in the words, "You're welcome." It is still raining, so another handful transposes itself into a Japanese doll, which grows under your eyes limb by limb.

Mme. Butterfly, as Clara calls the doll, grows smaller and smaller, until she disappears to a dot which suddenly assumes the form of a paper square. As you look, a gorgeous butterfly appears on this and flutters its wings gracefully. The scene fades back into the first picture of Little Clara, but she is now surrounded by the very toys you have seen, instead of the paper bits. She daintily throws "a million of kisses" to you in farewell.

A WOMAN'S TRICK (August 10).—Old William and Theodore are too good friends for the liking of Theodore's wife, who does not care to see him drawn into the franc-dispersing gayeties of the village inn. It is impossible to separate the two boon companions until Theodore's wife accuses old William of making love to her. Then Theodore becomes infuriated and the quarrel which Mme. Theodore had planned, occurs and separates them.

PROPOSAL BY PROXY (August 3).—His business rivals found him to be bold and assertive, but the girl he loved decided he was the most bashful creature in the world. She knew he was terribly fond of her, and she also knew that he had tried to propose to her, but somehow he never was able to say the words which she was eager to answer with "yes."

The young man knew his failing, and tried to overcome it. Finally, deciding that he could not say what he wanted, he proposed in writing. His ill luck pursued him, for the letter came back, he having failed to address it. Then he tried the telephone, and has hated the central girls ever since. Last of all he enlisted his charmer's baby sister as an ally and this time his efforts were crowned with success.

Still it must be admitted that things did not run as smoothly as he had anticipated. The proposal was made under such unique circumstances that a man of courage would have fled, but this particular man won out because anger drove his bashfulness away and for once he was assertive in love, thereby winning the girl of his choice.

THE PROTECTORY'S OLDEST BOY (August 5).—For fifty years the Catholic Protectory has done much to make good citizens out of boys who would otherwise have had no chance in life, and many of the most prominent men in New York City owe their proud positionas to the training and care they received while wards of the protectory.

A wealthy man received an invitation to the protectory's golden jubilee. He was now wealthy and held a high position in the national government, but the protectory had sheltered him when he was a friendless waif, so his feelings toward the great institution were those of deepest gratitude. Accompanied by his little grand-daughter, he visited his old home.

While the statesman viewed the impressive ceremonies his little grand-daughter formed the acquaintance of one of the protectory boys. The statesman heard the boy's story and the little chap's pathetic tale of privation touched the successful man and awoke memories of his own past. He determined to take the child to his handsome home, educate him and make him a credit to the protectory.

The boy left the institution with his new guardian and is now being carefully educated. He is a manly little fellow, and the statesman, "the protectory's oldest boy," firmly believes that in years to come the great institution will be proud to name the youngster as one of their graduates.

THE GIRL OF THE CABARET (August 8).—A young girl, who had talent as a violinist, came to New York determined to win fame on the concert stage. She found the field overcrowded, but accepted an engagement as violin soloist in a cabaret restaurant. She was pretty and her playing pleased the patrons of the place.

One evening a roughly dressed man came into the restaurant. His attire was in sharp contrast to the foppish men in evening dress who were languidly eating their meals. When the young violinist made her appearance the countryman showed by his manner that she had made a deep impression upon him. He came evening after evening to the restaurant and finally made her acquaintance. His interest in her was not the superficial, selfish attention such as the girl had received from her Broadway admirers, and the little violinist soon realized that he loved her and she returned his love. They married and went to his farm to live.

They were ideally happy for several years, and then the glamor of their love passed away and the girl longed for her former life. Her husband strove in vain to cheer her. Finally she left him, taking her little girl with her, and returned to New York to make her way in the world alone.

Her violin playing lacked the spirit of former years, and she failed to obtain engagements. She would have been in dire need if her little daughter had not made a success on the stage. The two lived in comfort, but the woman was unhappy, for she missed her husband and longed to return to him.

A May Day party for theatrical children was held in Central Park and the child attended it with her nurse. The youngster ran away from her guardian and ran into a stalwart man who was walking sadly alone. It was the husband and father, who had come to New York to find his loved ones. He recognized his child with joy. Together they went to the lonely woman and the little family was reunited, never to be parted again.

OH! SUCH A BEATIFUL OCEAN (August 10).—The young clubman did not have any trouble with his mother-in-law, for the simple reason that he could not induce her to let him marry her daughter. The woman took a violent dislike to the genial young man, forbade him to visit the house, and seemed to have an uncanny faculty of always being on hand when the suitor met the girl of his choice.

The youth's chance came one day, however, when he learned that his mother-in-law had arranged for a yachting party. In his own little boat he rowed out some time before the yacht started, managed to be upset, and of course he was taken aboard the yacht. The woman frankly admitted that she would like to throw him overboard, but a fear of what society might think restrained her.

Having won the first trick, the young man found an unexpected ally in his fight for the second. This was old Neptune; it became very rough on the boat, and soon the old woman lost all interest in everything except the silent tomb which she believed was very near her. There was a minister aboard, a friend of the clubman, and he consented to marry the young couple, provided there was no objection. The bridegroom didn't object, neither did the bride, and when the mother was spoken to she simply said wearily, "Get married if you want to, but let me die in peace." And while the boat tossed, the ceremony began and concluded, and the old lady was so unhappy that she neither knew nor cared that a son-in-law had become a member of her family.

THE MISSING WITNESS (2 parts—August 12).—A wave of reform had swept across the city, and the head of the political machine, in order to carry the election, nominated an honorable man for city treasurer, and the entire machine ticket, through the nominee's popularity, was carried to success. The city treasurer proved to be entirely out of sympathy with the boss's policies, and insisted on conducting his department in a businesslike manner. He scorned the threats of the political leader, for his conscience was clear. The boss, however, was cunning, and charges were preferred against the city treasurer, claiming misappropriation of funds. The manufactured evidence appeared so conclusive that the treasurer was compelled to resign and he died a short time later, a disgraceful and broken-hearted man.

A few years later the dead man's son became district attorney, and he devoted himself to seeking out a way to ruin the politician who had caused his father's death. Several of the boss's henchmen were indicted and purchased their freedom by confession. Then the hand of the prosecutor reached out for the city treasurer, the man who had succeeded his father, and whom he felt sure had conspired with the boss to accomplish his ruin. The treasurer, panic stricken, told the boss that unless he could protect him he would turn state's evidence. There was a quarrel and only the interference of a policeman saved the treasurer from serious injury at the boss's hands. That evening the treasurer was killed on the city streets and the boss was found bending over the body, the weapon in his hands. He was tried and found guilty, and his life would have been forfeited if the widow of the late treasurer had not come forward and testified that another man committed the crime and that the boss was innocent. She had kept silent because of the cruel wrong the politician had done the man she loved, but her sense of honor was too great to permit him to suffer for a crime he did not commit.

THE LIE THAT FAILED (August 15).—The young heiress was engaged and she and the man of her choice were very much in love. Her guardian, however, looked forward to her marriage with dread, for he had dissipate a large part of her fortune and expected punishment when the discovery was made. The girl's sweetheart went abroad. Another suitor, an unscrupulous business man, who admired the girl for her beauty, learned of the guardian's dishonesty, and threatened to expose him, but promised if he married the girl, that the defalcation would never be discovered. The letters from abroad were intercepted, and after long, weary months without hearing from her fiance, the girl became convinced that he was faithless and consented to marry the business man.

A few years later, the young man returned from Europe to find that the girl was married. The marriage, however, had not been a happy one, for the husband soon tired of his wife and life became almost unbearable to her. But when she met her former sweetheart and he reproached her for her faithlessness, she learned of the deception which had been practiced upon her. But the barrier of a little band of gold, her wedding ring, stood between them.

The husband chanced to overhear them and was filled with a rage to find that his plot was revealed. His doctor had warned him that his heart was weak and that he could live only a few months. He knew that the two whom he had so cruelly wronged would wed after his death, so he planned to prevent it in a manner that was diabolical in its ingenuity. The husband wrote a note, stating that his wife had poisoned him and prepared to drink the contents of a tiny vial. But before the plot could be carried into execution, the vengeance of heaven overtook him, for a giant meteor struck the earth and destroyed the wicked man.

The widow could not mourn a man who had treated her so cruelly and soon married the man whom she had always loved.

MAJESTIC.

TOLD IN THE FUTURE (August 3).—Robert Kenneth, a puppet in that phase of life in which the make-believe surrounds so-called "society," is caught between a conflict of emotion and indecision. Two avenues lead to future life—one with a woman of his father's choice, wealth and indolence, or disinheritance and a struggle for existence with the girl he loves.

His father's ultimatum drives him to his club for seclusion and a decision. There, after ineffectual attempt to dissuade his father over the 'phone, he falls asleep and dreams into the future. The action that follows, pictures him in the future as married to the woman of his father's choice; his life as a broker ruined by speculation; his return home to a wife adamant to the suffering his misfortune has caused; her derision and taunts at his threats of suicide, in which she hands him the weapon with which he can accomplish the ignominious end.

As dreamed—further along in his downward plunge, deserted by the woman, Kenneth meets the girl he really loved and sacrificed for his money. She in contrast, offers him aid and sympathy and is leading him to succor and comfort when the scene shifts to a vision of the same girl married to another man and in happiness with children adding complete bliss and serenity to the picture of domesticity.

Kenneth goes thus far into "what might have been" when he awakens. His glimpse into the future has decided him on his choice. He rings up his father and tells the old man of his intention. The intensity of the situation is accentuated by the conversation between the men over the phone.

Kenneth marries the girl of his choice and takes her to his father's office. They are snubbed by the woman of the first part, but the father, now brought to a realization of his son's strength of purpose and determination, forgives.

A DEVILISH DOCTOR (August 9).—Dr. Rice is wrapped up in two things, his new patented invention—an electrical device which cures gout—and Lilly. This is particularly fortunate, for Lilly's father is addicted to good things and gout. He calls on Lilly and attends to pa and stands well in with Bud—Lilly's small brother. One day he gets an invitation to a fancy dress ball and decides to go as Mephistopheles. He tries his suit on and he looks the devil to the life. The phone rings. It is an agitated call from Lilly. Bud has been practising balancing stunts and has let the broom drop on pa's gouty toe. Come at once. Ha! Here is the chance for his new treatment—approved by the College of Physicians. All thought of fancy dress are forgotten, and seizing his device, off he goes with red cloak aflying and moustaches bristling, a fiendish looking person. He passes the housekeeper on the steps, and after she has picked herself up she runs to the police station and tells them that the devil sure has come amongst them. Several members of the force start in pursuit, although they do not like the job. As Rice goes along he tests his apparatus and it flashes sparks. Each time he flashes it he frightens some woman or man out of his or her wits. Children get mixed and the housemaids and nurses faint, even the police prefer to attack him instead of seizing him. He arrives at the home of his future father-in-law; his girl's ma gives one look and bolts. Bud presses her hard in a race for safety. Pa is on a chair with one leg up, but this does not prevent his taking the window sash with him as he goes.

Dr. Rice is astonished, the police catch him as he chases the father and it is hard to tell what might happen to him, when Lilly comes on, and taking off his head-dress, reveals him. Of course, Rice cures pa of his gout and the rest is plain sailing.

THE GREATEST LOVE (August 10).—Janet is beloved by Frank Bruning, but she does not reciprocate his affections; for there is another man—Robert Burroughs, who is rapidly rising in his profession, that of a criminal lawyer. She accepts the latter's proposal. Bruning sees an announcement of the engagement and decides to do all in his power to stop it. He thinks of a former ally of his, an adventuress. He calls upon her at a time when she is quarreling with a former lover of hers.

Bruning proposes that she make Janet jealous in some way, and to this end he contrives to have this woman, Marion White, invited to the engagement party. Marion manages cleverly and faints in Burroughs' arms as Bruning leads Janet on the scene. Marion kisses Burroughs passionately. No words of his will appease Janet and she sends him away and the engagement is broken.

Bruning shows Janet sympathy and so arranges that he is at last accepted. Burroughs reads of her engagement and tries to put her from his mind.

Marion White needs money and tells Bruning that she will speak to Burroughs unless she receives it. Bruning hastens to see her. When he reaches her residence he hears sounds of a violent quarrel and a crash. He bursts in the window and sees the body of Marion's lover on the floor with a knife near by. A bronze bust has fallen upon him in the struggle, in which he has pleaded desperately with the woman, and finally has followed her up until she thought he meant to injure her. Marion has drawn a knife, and he snatching it from her, has fallen against the pedestal and the knife has performed its work in the fall. Bruning kneels by the man and Marion rapidly thinks of an escape from the compromising position. She runs outside and returns with a policeman and accuses Bruning with murder. He is taken away despite his protests.

Janet and her father and mother see Bruning and believe his story and decide to stand by him. Their counselor insists that Burroughs be retained to defend Bruning, and Janet's father goes to him to ask him to do this service. After a mental struggle he decides he will do it for Marion's sake. He calls at the home of Marion during her absence and gathers much of the story from her maid, who has seen much. He forms his plans and secures her co-operation readily.

He persuades Janet and her people to hold some private theatricals, to which Mrs. Marion White is invited. During the evening Burroughs, attired as near like the lover as possible, and the maid, attired in Mrs. White's clothes with false hair, enact the scene of the killing or accident as clearly as they can, and Marion, in fear, rises and tells the story as it stands in a dramatic scene.

Bruning is freed and is man enough to be struck with Burroughs' magnificent act. He confesses his cupidity and the lovers are reunited.

THE DOCTOR'S RUSE (August 12).—Gerald Forbes, a medical student, is assistant to Dr. Smythe. He is in love with Violet, the doctor's daughter: they are only waiting for him to get his degree to announce their engagement. The time arrives when he receives his degree as M. D., but the doctor refuses to agree to their engagement until Gerald has established a practice.

In desperation he goes to a small town, where he is the only doctor, but after waiting some weeks and not having had a single patient, hires a man to have his face made up as though he had smallpox. He isolates him in his house, then announces to the village that smallpox has broken out and the whole village must be vaccinated. His office is crowded with patients and he telegraphs to the doctor and his daughter to visit him. The result is that the doctor offers Forbes a partnership and agrees to his marriage with his daughter.

After having liberally paid the man who has spent some days in seclusion, he leaves for the city with the doctor and his daughter and the fees of many hundreds of patients he has vaccinated.

AMERICAN.

A TIDE IN THE AFFAIRS OF MEN (August 18).—Vivenot, miser, old and helpless, lives in an attic. Little Jessie, daughter of the landlord of the house, is good to him. In her visits to the attic, Jessie has seen a bag of money and jewels, which the miser tucks away in a hidden cranny of the chimney. Dying, the old miser names Jessie as his heir, but her father and the lawyer find only a few pennies in the box. These they give to the little girl with the will, jestingly calling her "the little heiress."

Jessie, grown up, married, with a little daughter of her own, is a flood victim. In the wrecks of her household goods she finds the old will. At the same time her husband brings her the news that her childhood home has been condemned at a menace and is to be torn down. A vague recollection of seeing the old miser with a bag in his hand when she was a child comes to Jessie. She slips away to her old home and searches in the chimney and is attacked by a ghoul, as she triumphantly brings forth the bag. She is rescued by her husband in the desperate struggle that ensues.

THE GOLDEN HEART (August 21).—The theme of this story has to do with the trials and final success of two young people, a boy and a girl, who leave their homes to join in a stampede to a newly discovered mining district. Later they find themselves on the trail facing the necessity of doing for themselves things they have never done before. Next day affairs run no better with either of them, and the young man, in attempting to make a pie, burns it. As it was impossible to eat this, he nails it to a post in front of his tent and above is placed a sign, "Girl Wanted."

The sign attracts the girl's attention, and, after a little maneuvering, it is agreed that she help him out in his cooking, while he makes himself of use to her in many other ways. Eventually they form a regular working partnership. The busy days roll by without much success. One day as he is resting on a hillside with a group of fellow-prospectors, they slip a lot of loose rock into his pack, and upon arrival at camp he learns why his pack was so heavy. He is tired and out of humor, and it is the girl who first notices that the rock is really gold ore and very rich. They learn from the others where this rock was placed in the pack, and later find the original ledge and locate it. In working their find, and being unaccustomed to the use of dynamite, they have an accidental explosion in which the boy is injured and is obliged to remain in camp a week or more. Upon their return to the claim, they find two men in possession, who refuse to vacate, and as the explosion has destroyed their location notice, there is no proof of their property.

They return to camp and call a miners' meeting and the entire party return to the claim and in the discussion that takes place, the girl finds a piece of the original notice blown into a crevice of the rocks and the jumpers are forced to relinquish their claim. The boy, in his enthusiasm, takes the girl into his arms, and in the confusion, a grizzly old miner, with a wink, slips a ring off his finger to the boy, who passes it on to the girl, who acepts it. They are married by a justice, move the two tents into one establishment and the final scene shows that evening, two silhouetted figures against the tent walls in fond embrace.

FLESH OF HIS FLESH (August 23).—The husband's suit for divorce is granted by the magistrate and the decree is thrice welcome to the indolent wife. Little thought has been given to their child, until the stern judge awards the custody of the boy to the father. This was an angle the woman had not contemplated, but the ruling had been made and there was no alternative; so after an affectionate farewell, mother and child parted. In the woman's heart she has resolved to regain her child. Some time later she secures the child and departs to the sea-coast, where she lives a secluded life.

Years have passed and the father has become the county sheriff. Visiting the town one day, the boy, now a young man, becomes involved in an altercation, and in self-defense, strikes his antagonist, felling the latter with one blow. The alarm is given and the young man seeks refuge in flight. At the coast he enters his boat and puts to sea. The sheriff and his deputy give chase, but too late to apprehend the man. They follow the direction of the boat along the shore, preventing it from effecting a landing. Without food the young man at sea becomes exhausted, and, too weak to manipulate the boat, drifts about aimlessly.

Patiently the expectant mother awaits the return of her son, little dreaming of his dire distress at sea. Neighbors sight the boat and put out to the rescue, returning with the all but dead seaman. The sheriff has watched from a distance, and is soon on hand to arrest his man, not knowing his identity. At the little shack he recognizes the wife, and upon inquiry as to their boy, is led into the room where the young man, exhausted from hunger and exposure, is being carefully nursed back to life.

The sheriff came to arrest a man—not his son. At the bed of the boy the two estranged hearts are reunited and the almost dead embers of love are fanned back to life to blaze anew until the divine edict; "until death doth part," shall be executed.

MUTUAL EDUCATIONAL.

FUNNICUS WINS THE RACE (July 31).—Funnicus is surely endowed with extraordinary inventive faculties! His pranks bear the stamp of genius. He reads of the coming motor races, and an idea strikes him. He papers all Paris with posters stating that he will take a limited number of passengers to the races for the small sum of 10 to 20 francs a day. Tickets on sale at 7 Invention Street. Crowds respond. They find the train to be composed of barrel and soap-box cars attached to a home-made locomotive, and joy of joys, a dining-room is included.

The trip is as boisterous as it is hazardous. They stop at Half-way House to take in "fuel." Then the banquet. Delicious! Most novel! The journey to the motor meet ends all too soon. The travelers alight. Bravo, Funnicus: the race is on. Every imaginable mishap that could delay him is met by our hero, but he duplicates the tale of the tortoise and the hare. When the grand-stand occupants see that a "dark horse" has won the coveted race, they cheer Funnicus to the echo. "Once a hero, always a hero," thinks he complacently.

MICROSCOPIC ANIMALCULAE FOUND IN STAGNANT WATER (July 31).—Have you ever hung in fascinated wonderment over the marvels disclosed in a drop of water by the magnifier? Then you will surely enjoy this reel, which acquaints the eye with an invisible form of life which peoples impure, sedimentary waters. These semi-opaque, vapory animalculae are classed as "infusoria," and vary in size from one-thousandth of a millimetre to three millimetres.

They are distinguished by trailing appendices, whereby they cling to position and capture their prey. Also by cavernous, proportionately, suctional mouths, from which weaker forms of life have little opportunity to escape. These projections were obtained by linear enlargements of 1,000 times.

THE GREEN-EYED MONSTER (August 7).—After the honeymoon, the Newlyweds rent a house and start housekeeping. Mrs. Newlywed loves her husband devotedly, but at times, and on the slightest provocation becomes jealous of her hubby. Unfortunately the picture of a chum of Newlywed's sister finds its way into his effects and is found by Mrs. Newlywed in helping her spouse to unpack his things. A storm is averted, but the seed is sown. Mrs. Newlywed has a desire to own a horse and Newlywed plans to surprise her with one as a Christmas present. By an unfortunate coincidence the horse he has selected for his wife bears the same name as his sister's chum and Mrs. Newlywed finding some of the correspondence referring to the horse, jumps to the conclusion that the Bess referred to in the letter is the same as the Bess in the picture and becomes a victim of the green-eyed monster, thinking her husband is deceiving her. Circumstantial evidence accumulates and she consults a lawyer regarding a divorce, taking with her the letters she has filched and the photo of the supposed destroyer of her happiness. The lawyer she consults proves to be the husband of the Bess in the picture and the "green-eyed monster" finds another victim in the man of law and letters.

He rushes from his office, determined to secure satisfaction, if not an explanation, from the villain who had wrecked his home, leaving Mrs. Newlywed to await his return. The explanation is forthcoming, and the lawyer admits the drinks are "on him." A meeting is then arranged between Mrs. Newlywed and "Bess" and the course of true love resumes its peaceful way again.

RELIANCE.

KENTUCKY FOES (August 11).—A feud exists between the houses of Amsden and Nelson. Fred, the only son of Amsden, desiring to procure some property owned by Nelson, writes him a note of truce, which old man Nelson promptly returns torn to bits. Fred has a far more bitter disappointment in store when Dorothy Lewis refuses his love and accepts that of Andy Nelson, a braggart and imbiber. Next day, Dorothy scrambling around the rocks near Amsden's estate, sees her lover approaching. Spying her, Andy goes to her and she sees to her indignation that he is intoxicated. She repulses him, but he persistently endeavors to embrace her, until, with raging spirit, she pushes him over the rocky incline. Fred Amden, on his way home from the fields, hears her screams. She tells him frantically she has killed Andy Nelson. Desiring to shield the girl he loves, Fred drags the lifeless form toward some nearby bushes and is seen by the youngest Nelson boy, Tom. So while Fred is overtaking Dorothy and half carrying her to his house, Tom is racing home with the terrible news. Grabbing their guns, the Nelsons make for their enemy's home. Fred and Dorothy seeing their approach, repel their attack. One against six appearing hopeless, Dorothy escapes from the rear and runs for help. In the meantime Fred is holding off the enemy with an occasional shot. Andy, having recovered by this time, staggers to his feet and up the path. Dorothy running along at full speed, runs fully into him and at first thinks it is a spectre. She then realizes that she is not a murderess. Fred, in the meantime, having used up all his ammunition, is captured by the Nelsons and dragged out and then taken to the place of the supposed murder, to be shot for his crime. Arriving at the spot, Dorothy explains all and they learn the truth. The Nelsons are so overjoyed at the recovery of their son that they hold forth the hand of friendship to Fred and depart, taking Andy with them. Then Dorothy turns gratefully to her real hero.

RUNA PLAYS CUPID (August 13).—Runa's mother, a pretty widow, and handsome Dr. Hale know each other by sight only. They meet at a garden party and become good friends through the medium of the child, who takes quite a fancy to the doctor. Runa is taken sick and all through the terrifying hours of her illness, Dr. Hale and the frightened mother watch at the little bedside. The night of the crisis is a long wearying siege, but the dawn brings restful sleep and surcease of fever to the child. In her joy at the baby's recovery, the mother sobs out her relief in Hale's arms and it is then that they realize their love. Happy days follow with Runa, a cheerful convalescent. But Mrs. Adams' lawyer comes from the city to see her on business. She introduces Hale and knowing he is a trifle jealous, she pretends a great interest in the other man. After his departure, he angrily accuses her of flirting. Proudly she resents his attitude, angry words follow, and the doctor returns home with his ring in his pocket. The days that follow are lonely. When Runa asks why the doctor doesn't come any more, Mrs. Adams has to admit that he will never come again. Runa then takes matters into her own hands. She decides that she will be sick again, so the doctor will have to come to her. When he arrives Runa explains her deception to him and he, ashamed of his foolishness, goes to the mother and their quarrel is soon a thing of the past.

OF SUCH IS THE KINGDOM (August 16).—Parson Morton is writing a sermon and is using for the text Christ's words regarding children—"Of such is the kingdom of Heaven." While he is writing his little daughter, Runa, invites two little waifs, Rosanna and Billy, to play with her in her father's garden. The parson and his wife are very shocked when they find their daughter in the company of the two waifs. Runa is scolded and told that she must not associate with that kind of children. The waifs are driven from the garden and Runa taken into the house. Later the parson and his wife visit some friends and while they are away, Runa, being neglected by her nurse, takes the opportunity to play with the two waifs again. While they are playing, Runa accidentally falls into a well, but is rescued by Billy, who manages to get hold of her dress, and sends Rosanna for help. After a few complications showing alternately the danger of Runa and the difficulty of Rosanna in getting help and the heroism of Billy who holds on to Runa until he is utterly exhausted. Rosanna finds the parson who comes to the rescue. He then recognizes the fact that children are no respectors of persons—that all are akin, and "Of such is the kingdom of Heaven."

BRONCHO.

THE HERITAGE OF EVE (2 parts—August 20).—Nat Boyd, a telegraph operator, deeply mourns the death of his father, recently shot in the Civil War. He makes application for a position in the U. S. Secret Service and is accepted. He remembers a college chum, John Stilton, who is now a captain in the Confederate army, and whose father is a retired colonel. He manages to secure an invitation to visit the Stiltons, claiming that his health is affected by the northern climate, and he goes to work as a spy. General Lee makes his headquarters at the Stilton home, and Nat taps the telegraph wires, but is unable to discover the secret code until one day General Lee, suspicious of a click in the wires, has the code changed and it is blown out of the window. Nat copies it before the telegraph operator misses it and looks for it.

Nat has feigned such ill health that the Stiltons invite his mother down to nurse him. She is a handsome woman and Col. Stilton falls in love with her and proposes marriage. She has become fond of the Colonel and accepts him, and she tries to dissuade her son from the contemptible work he is doing. John Stilton discovers the duplicity of his friend, and does not wish to expose him, as it would ruin his father's life and of Mrs. Stilton, for whom he has a deep affection, so he arranges false messages, which Nat intercepts and sends to the enemy. Mrs. Stilton learns of this and commands him to stop John Stilton, who has started for the front, threatening to expose her son if he does not comply. Nat goes after John, and is stopped by Southern sentries. In attempting to gallop past them he is mortally wounded. A terrible battle takes place, the Union army acting on the false information and being badly defeated. John Stilton conceals the actions of Nat, and tells his father that Nat died carrying false messages for John to the enemy.

KAY-BEE.

AN ORPHAN OF WAR (2 parts—August 22).—John Waldron, a giant mountaineer in West Virginia, is a Northern sympathizer at the outbreak of the Civil War and is hated by his neighbors. His son, Tom, a bright little lad, has been brought up by his father to have a deep regard for righteousness and to always perform the duty his conscience tells him is right. One day Waldron is attacked by his neighbors and a fierce struggle ensues, in which Waldron's great strength is taxed to the utmost, but he finally escapes, covering the mob with his rifle. The Southern army reaches the locality and a captain is informed of the actions of the fighting Northerner, and a squad is sent to arrest Waldron, who puts up a desperate defense before he is overpowered by force of numbers. The prisoner is about to be strung up when little Tom, who has been hiding in the cellar where his father sent him, follows the soldiers with his rifle and as the rope is being adjusted about his father's neck he opens fire and kills a couple of soldiers. The captain, mortally wounded, sees Waldron escaping and staggering to his feet shoots and kills him. Tom is chased by the soldiers, and escapes by donning the clothes of a scarecrow and standing still. After the soldiers are gone he hides in the thicket for a few days, and finally emerges, ravenously hungry. He meets Betty, the little daughter of Col. Johnstone, a Southern officer, and the child gives him her sandwiches. The two quickly become fast friends, but Betty is taken away by her colored nurse, who had taken Betty out for an outing in the woods. Betty loses her locket, with the picture of her father in it, which Tom picks up and keeps.

General Freemont, hemmed in by Stonewall Jackson, tries to get a message to General McClellan. The messenger is pursued by Confederate soldiers and is badly wounded. Realizing that he is dying, he secretes the message under a stone, and when his dead body is searched by the soldiers they find nothing. Tom, hiding in the thicket, has seen the packet hidden, and discovers the nature of the message. He manages to deliver the note, after many hardships, and McClellan attacks Jackson. During the battle which follows, Tom, who is an expert shot, climbs in a tree and picks off officers, burning with hate for the Southern soldiers who have caused the death of his father. During a charge by the Union soldiers he shoots Colonel Johnstone. Climbing down, he goes to taunt the wounded man and is amazed to find the original of the picture in the locket, and remembering the kindly little girl he goes for aid in the Confederate camp. Johnstone's life is saved, but he is compelled to go home on sick leave, and he takes Tom, who has been held as an honored prisoner, with him. Tom and Betty renew their acquaintance, and it is plain to be seen that the little orphan of war has at last found a real home.

GREAT NORTHERN.

A SHOT IN THE DARK (August 2).—Johnson is a young solicitor and with his wife Eva and their baby girl Dorothy occupy a town house. The wife and baby take a short vacation and during their absence, Johnson meets Lizzie, a former sweetheart. There is a visit to a cafe and the old love days are discussed. Upon the return of his wife, Johnson gives every outward evidence of being guilty of transgressing and finally makes a confession to his wife. She leaves him and with her child and Jane, an old servant, takes up her abode elsewhere. When little Dorothy is stricken with illness, Jane informs her father and the latter makes an appointment to visit his former home at 11 o'clock at night. While kneeling at the bedside of the little one, the wife, who had been slumbering in an adjoining room is aroused, and thinking that a burglar has entered the house grasps a revolver and enters the sick chamber. There is a shot in the dark and Johnson is slightly wounded in the arm. But the shot brings about a reconciliation between husband and wife at the bedside of their child.

THE FIVE COPIES (August 9).—In this comedy the story discloses that Clara, a stenographer is in love with Lionel, one of the clerks in the office in which she is employed. While absent from the office to attend to certain duties in the works, Clara takes possession of Lionel's typewriting machine and finding paper already adjusted, writes him a message to the effect that she loves him and will meet him in the park at 8 o'clock on the same evening. While passing the desk each of the four clerks in the office pick up one of the sheets, for it has so happened that Lionel was about to make five copies of a letter when he was summoned to the works. When quitting time arrives the clerks make inroads upon the petty cash box and prepare themselves to meet Clara in the park. The boss also gets one of the copies and hastens to keep the appointment. When he arrives, Lionel and Clara are making love and the clerks are standing in the background filled with envy and jealousy. The boss decides that, he is not the chosen one and beats a hasty retreat and the disappointed clerks soon follow his example. Fatty, one of the clerks, hires a carriage with the intention of asking Clara out for a ride, but at the crucial moment Clara and Lionel take possession of the carriage and all ends merrily.

LUX.

THE POISONED DAGGER (August 15).—Returning from a voyage to the East, a sailor distributes presents among his friends. To his fiancee he gives a gaudily colored shawl, and to her father he makes a present of a quaint knife of Oriental manufacture. The arrival of the sailor entirely ruins the hopes of Claude Baker, a village lad who aspires to the hand of Dolly, the daughter of an old miner. Dolly prefers the sailor and Claude is greatly enraged. When the old miner descends the mine, the rope attached to the cage is cut, and he is hurled several feet into the depths below. The affair is a mystery until Claude Baker comes forward with a knife he found near the scene of the outrage. The knife is identified, and suspicion falls immediately upon the sailor, who is arrested. Just as the police are about to remove their prisoner, Claude Baker is seized by dreadful pains and expires. He confesses his guilt, and it is then found that he has cut himself with the dagger, which he used to cut the rope. Thus the biter is bit, for the dagger had been dipped in a deadly poison, the existence of which is only known to the denizens of the mysterious Far East.

OVER THE GARDEN WALL (August 22).—The amusing adventures of a young gentleman who lived next door to a ladies' boarding-school. He falls in love with one of the mistresses and incurs trouble thereby. It is a very funny episode, and much laughter will be caused when the bulldog of the seminary chases the young gentleman over the garden wall.

THE REGISTERED LETTER (August 22).—An exciting drama of an attempt to rob a village post-office, of the postmistress's courage in telegraphing for assistance and of the thrilling rescue.

THE WAR CORRESPONDENTS (Feature Subject).—Bretton, furnished with credentials to Balkan officers, obtains a personal letter from the Minister of War, charging his subordinates to give the young newspaper man every assistance. On the train Bretton meets Clark, correspondent of a rival newspaper. While passing through the Customs, Clark catches sight of Bretton's letters of recommendation. Not having any himself, he resolves to steal them.

The story jumps to the scene of warfare, where Sonia and her father are tending their sheep. The old man is killed by a stray bullet and is buried by his mourning daughter.

The two correspondents proceed on foot to headquarters, and notice from the edge of a precipice a skirmish between the contending forces. In order to more clearly observe the fight, Bretton throws down his knapsack. Approaching too near the edge, he makes a false step and falls. His cries are heard by Sonia, who in going to his rescue risks her life. Clark cuts open his rival's knapsack and steals the coveted papers. Bearing these, he goes to headquarters, where he is warmly received. Bretton recovers from his fall and is somewhat smitten by his rescuer. Found by the soldiers, without credentials, he is arrested as a spy. He escapes from the guard tent and gallops away on a horse, untouched by the sentry's pursuing bullets.

The battle is in progress and both correspondents have their stories ready. Clark, tricked by Sonia, is detained in his attempt to reach the telegraph office, and so Bretton's telegram goes through. When Clark finally arrives the wires are congested. Disgruntled, he visits a neighboring theater, but the enemy are within range and a well-directed shell crashes through the building and sends the audience and performers fleeing for their lives. Clark, among others, is rendered unconscious.

Bretton, hearing of an impending battle on the sea, journeys there, and by climbing a tree sees the demolition of a majestic war vessel by a hidden mine. Again the correspondents hasten to the telegraph office, and Sonia, aiding Bretton, again foils Clark.

Bretton, to obtain a better view of a land conflict, goes aloft in an aeroplane. It is shattered by a shell and falls earthward with a sickening crash. Sonia, who has been captured by the Turks after being wounded, has escaped from a hospital mosque and is wandering around when she sees the aeroplane descend. She saves Bretton from being burned to death. Again Bretton is triumphant in getting his story over the wires ahead of Clark. He asks Sonia to return home with him as his wife.

The young people, on the conclusion of hostilities, arrive in Bretton's home town and are congratulated warmly on their work by the newspaper's proprietor. They meet Clark, their former enemy, and all differences are ended in a warm handshake and the declaration that "all is fair in war and love."

UNION FEATURES.

THE GREEN GOD; or THE FLOWER GIRL OF MONTMARTE (Feature subject—3 parts).—Baron Desroches, having been piqued by the refusal of the little flower girl, Marie Louise, to entertain his advances plans to be avenged. To the high class restaurant where Pierre Sandri, the sweetheart of Marie, plays the violin, he brings an imperious Parisian beauty, Gaby Derilly, who proceeds to ensnare Sandri into her net. The next day when he calls upon her, Gaby asks him to play at a private reception. To show how pleased he is to do this for her he kisses her hand, and their shadows are seen on the window shades by Marie, who has been wandering around the mansion.

At the reception the Parisian beauty exercises all the wiles of an accomplished flirt and succeeds in having the handsome violinist fervently kiss her hand. Just then Marie, who entered unobserved, goes into the reception-room, sees what her sweetheart has done and creates a scene. Being renounced by her lover, Marie accepts the escort of Baron Desroches, who takes her to a hotel and has her dressed in the most fashionable attire, with a goodly amount of jewels. Arrayed thusly she goes into the dining-room, where the Baron tries to kiss her. A realization of what she is doing comes to her and she throws off the jewels and runs to her mother's cottage. She learns to her surprise that her lover was only temporarily infatuated with the beauty. As she is going to his home the next day to make peace with him she meets outside Gaby, who has come to his residence to enchant him again after he had cast her off for ordering the flower girl from the reception-room. Marie struck Gaby and fled. Several weeks later as Marie is selling her flowers some of Gaby's friends slip a purse into her pocket and have her arrested for stealing. After having served her prison term, Marie learns how her misfortune came about. Revenge enters her heart and she goes home, dresses in men's clothes and proceeds to the home of Gaby. She conceals herself behind the boudoir hangings and is about to seek retaliation by shooting Gaby when she discovers a burglar, whom she shoots. The exhausted flower girl is carried to a hospital, where she tells her story. Gaby, repentant, reconciles the lovers and when Marie reaches home she finds a beautiful floral tribute from the repentant girl.

MOVING PICTURE ELECTRIC LIGHT PLANT

Used and Highly Endorsed by the United States Army.
BIGGEST SENSATION IN THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD
Can be operated by a boy 10 years old. One customer writes:
"Plant running like a top and delivering the 'juice' right along every day for our moving picture house. Costs us about one-tenth as much as public service. Also pumps water to all our buildings, 2,000 gallons per day."

Write to-day for Bulletin 101. It is a mighty interesting booklet.

Three Men and a Woman.

Helen A Sister

An Original Story in Three Parts

The most beautiful and dramatic picture ever made in three parts, showing Miss Gardner in a most captivating role. Picturesque in costume and setting, and presented with a perfection of detail rarely seen. State rights only. Wire or write.

"The Smugglers."

"I Could Wear These."

Never Mind—I'm Not as Wicked as I look.

The QUALITY of FILMS in GENERAL FILM SERVICE is Reflected in the Offerings of Our Advertising Service

Our posters, lantern slides, banners, photographs, and all the rest of our advertising helps are just as good as our films. We have a reputation to live up to, and we do it.

Banners and lantern slides constitute a very small part of our stock. There isn't a single advertising help you might need that we cannot supply. One-sheet posters and three-sheets for single reels and multiple reels, photographs of prominent players, heralds, snipes, oak and brass frames for lobby display, and a thousand other things too numerous to mention are carried in stock and offered at prices that we defy you to beat.

ANNOUNCEMENT

We are now printing the word "Eastman" on the margin of all our Cine film. We want the exhibitor to know when he is and when he is not getting Eastman film. It will be to his advantage—and ours.

Of course it will take time for such identifiable films to reach the consumer—so don't expect results at once—but it's a step in the right direction—for your interests and ours.

SAPHO
FLORENCE ROBERTS
APPEARING IN
SAPHO.

Florence Roberts "Sapho" will be to Filmdom what "Damaged Goods" is to the Stage—Both are Great Moral Lessons!

"SAPHO," denounced at the time of its writing—in an age of prudery—as sensational, is now everywhere recognized as a great moral lesson. It is bold in its treatment of the facts of life, but the boldness is for the best. Alphonse Daudet, the author, dedicated "SAPHO" to his sons, so that they might remember and be guided by its lesson. Turn out your sons to see this tremendous morality film, and your daughters, too! Let "SAPHO" be to filmdom what "Damaged Goods" is to the stage. Be first in the battle of film enlightenment by booking Miss Roberts' masterpiece for early showing in your theatre. Remember, in advertising, Shelly Hull and a formidable cast support the star.

Ha! Ha! One Round O'Brien Comes Back for a SERIES Now!

Yes, your wish is gratified. THE "ONE ROUND O'BRIEN" SERIES IS FREE. Fred Mace approved so much of your approval of his "Come Back" O'Brien reel, that he is doing some more O'Briens for you. All he wants is your applause. So long as he can appear in pictures that please you, he's happy! Portraying "One Round O'Brien" makes him happy, therefore, and you will understand his smile in the first film of the series. The name is "ONE ROUND O'BRIEN'S FLIRTATION." It really shows the inimitable pugulist as an aspiring flirt. You'll laugh yourself sick! Watch all the papers for the release date. The new week's releases are: "THE GREATEST LOVE," Sunday, Aug. 10, with Ann Drew, Lamar Johnstone and Ernest Joy; "THE DOCTOR'S RUSE," Tuesday, Aug. 12, Mace and Loveridge; "THE FICKLE TRAMP and A HORSE ON FRED," Saturday, Aug. 16, all-comedy split reel. Get the Sunday, the Tuesday AND the Saturday Majestic EVERY week!

is a recognized fact. It is the result of many years labor and research of the inventor, Mr. Nicholas Power, who for years has been recognized as an authority in the moving picture machine business.

It is the last word in moving picture machine development. It possesses every up-to-date improvement. Its vital features — the LOOP SETTER, the INTERMITTENT MOVEMENT — are exclusive.

The acknowledged perfect projection of the Cameragraph can be maintained only by the use of genuine parts, manufactured at our factory. They are of the finest degree of accuracy. Made of best material and guaranteed by us. Avoid spurious parts.

THE NEW THREE

WAITING FOR HUBBY Sunday, August 17

Hubby was a model hubby until the evening the picture pictures. Then the series of mishaps that befell him were wondrous to behold. And meantime wifey waited.

THE SPIRIT OF ENVY Tuesday, August 19

As she looked at her husband—slow, unsuccessful, but honest—she realized that at all odds he had done nothing that might bring shame on her; and her passion for riches and the spirit of envy passed.

THE MEDIUM'S NEMESIS Friday, August 22

He was a mere "copper"—a city bluecoat—but aided by the bright little son of the medium's victim, he quickly became her nemesis. In fact, he lodged her in jail and her swindling band with her.

The Firebugs

2 reels, August 21

The Popular Keystone Fun-Makers in a Two-Reel Comedy

This is a screamingly comical dramatization of the exposure of the "Arson Trust," in which a man tries to have his place burned to collect the insurance. Unfortunately, he does business with a "firebug" who has a rival, and this rival is piqued because he did not get the business. The fire takes place all right, but the rival extinguishes the blaze, and when the firemen arrive glaring evidence of the incendiary origin is apparent.

The Jealousy of the Colonel's Wife, Through Circumstantial Evidence, Causes a Family Misunderstanding

The wife's sister is in love with a private. The Colonel tries to put a stop to the attachment, and his actions are misconstrued by his wife, from whom he conceals her sister's love affair. The young couple elope, and the Colonel pursues them with a squad, and is attacked by Indians. The young soldier—the post telegrapher—mounts a telegraph post and sends a message for help, and is shot by the Indians. The troops come to the rescue, and the hero is carried back to the fort and nursed back to health. He is given an officer's commission, which removes the barrier between him and his wife.

"THE WATER RAT"

In Two Reels

This play, peculiar and powerful, has its origin in romantic England and is a study of fashionable society with a by-play of mysterious crime, that quite outdoes the feats of the famous "Raffles" dress-suit type. A daring and dashing collegian of wealth figures mysteriously in the title role and his depredations include all the grand mansions of the countryside before he finally comes to an accidental end and escapes the penalty of Newgate, adding to its historic calendar. Released August 25th

August 26th. "THE ADVENTURES OF A WATCH"—Is the crux of a sentimental episode in the life of a fashionable and attractive belle. On the same reel with: "THEY WERE ON THEIR HONEYMOON"—The comical adventures of a young married couple who win their way in life and a big wager as well.

"The Sign of the Black Lily"

(In Two Reels) For Release Tuesday, Sept. 2, 1913

Essentially a Dramatic Story combining a delightful tale of adventure with those wonderful stage settings for which house of Cines is famous.

You will like "The Sign of the Black Lily." Full of adventure, crowded with unexpected situations of splendid power, assisted by those most remarkable of stage mechanics, you find a new thrill in the charm of this delightful two-part subject.

How a wary, old white-haired favorite of the clubs and drawing-rooms is exposed as the leader of the "Black Lily" gang — how an enterprising detective wormed his way into the foul heart of the most vicious and corrupt organization in all Paris — how, by finding secret buttons, walls moved, floors disappeared revealing strange hiding places of the gang. What happened to the police — the valiant fight against overwhelming odds — the dramatic unmasking of the sleek villian in his own reception room crowded with guests — who little suspected his real character — all makes a film delightful for its strong situations, convincing acting and clever story.

Mary Fuller as Joyce

Joyce of the North Woods

From the Novel by Harriet T. Comstock

In Two Parts Released Friday, August 29th

A big story of the great woods, where love, hate and jealousy blow hot and cold like the pine-laden breezes. John Dale, having sacrificed everything that a man holds dear in order to save his brother, plunges into the North Woods to forget. Joyce, a child of nature, appeals to him, and when she marries Jude, an ugly tempered lumber-jack, Dale's sincere friendship and sympathy are misunderstood. Jude, believing the worst, drives Joyce from his cabin and hunts Dale with a gun, but death overtakes him before he accomplishes his purpose.

Facts and Comments

THE struggle for a rational Sunday observance more in keeping with the Christian than the Pharasaical traditions is, on the whole, encouraging for motion picture exhibitors. The ancient fanaticism does, however, break out with its accustomed virulence in certain parts of the country and on most unexpected occasions. In various places in the Northwest there have been Sabbatarian outbreaks, notably in the Dakotas. As similar sporadic outbreaks may be expected in other parts of the country, a few words of advice and encouragement to exhibitors may not come amiss.

The men and women who want to force the ancient rabbinical Sabbath upon their neighbors are rarely distinguished by either common sense, a spirit of moderation or gentle courtesy. As a result they often indulge in vehement abuse of their opponents, among whom they always seem to include moving picture men. Thus a minister in a Dakota town threatened to "run an exhibitor out of town for violating the Sabbath." The alleged violation consisted of a moving picture program with the following numbers: "Wood-cutting," "The Making of Rubber," "The Great Trees of California," and "The National Parks." Of course this minister has no official authority whatever and his threat to run another citizen out of town on such grounds as the exhibition of educational pictures on Sunday is entirely unwarranted and, we are inclined to think, distinctly unlawful. Leaders of various reforming bodies took a similar unreasoning and threatening attitude. It is but human in the exhibitor if he feels tempted to reply in kind and resort to personal arguments. It is far better for him, however, to stick to the logic of his argument and to ignore the personal attacks. When we know that we are right we do not help things by getting angry.

The whole Sunday question is, after all, regulated by public opinion rather than by the letter of any antiquated statute. Public opinion is now more often with the exhibitor than against him on this Sunday problem, and if he maintains a dignified silence under personal attacks replying never to abuse, but only to argument, he will strengthen his hold on public opinion. Personal abuse is always the weakest of arguments and the surest confession of defeat. The best replies to the crusades of the fanatics are to be found in the columns of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD and the summing up of the whole situation is the unanswerable argument that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. If the exhibitor supports his attitude on the Sunday question by giving a program specially suited to the character of the day he will find himself in an impregnable position.

AN exhibitor, writing from a small town in South Carolina, complains of the habits of certain producers to promise things in posters and advertising matter and to break the promise in the picture. Our correspondent says: "This thing of grossly exaggerating pictures will surely act as a boomerang to the whole business, innocent and guilty alike and yet I see nothing being done to try to check it." In these words we find an echo of many similar complaints. There is some ground for these grievances, though our correspondent is mistaken when he says there is no effort made to check the abuse. If he will open any file of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD he will find that we have done our share to abate the evil. The most effective way to put a stop to it lies in the hands of the exhibitor himself. He can make the exchange exert pressure on the producer and that means going at the root of things. In the letter from which we have been quoting special exception is taken to misrepresentations in historic pictures. In this latter respect we think there has been much improvement in the various big studios and an historical picture with glaring inconsistencies or anachronisms is now rather the exception than the rule.

MEN who conduct cheap amusement enterprises at the popular summer resorts complain that the moving picture houses take away their old public. Fifteen and even ten years ago the small circus, the museum of freaks from turtle-headed boys to Bosco; the astrological side show, the "fake" menagerie, etc., made big money at Coney Island and other seaside resorts where the crowds go on Saturdays and Sundays. To-day the number of these so-called entertainments is very much smaller and they lack patronage because the moving picture has been a tremendous popular educator. A few days ago we watched a very clever and attractive outside display with a corps of skilled "barkers" doing their best to attract attention. It was almost wholly in vain. Every moving picture theater in the immediate neighborhood was crowded to capacity and people moving in and out all the time. Are we not justified to describe this influence of the motion picture as both wholesome and educational?

Another Exhibitors Problem.

By W. Stephen Bush

WHAT ought an exhibitor to do when his audience begins to laugh a cheap melodrama off the screen? Perhaps he ought to ask his special officer to walk up and down the main aisle with a menacing air, or perhaps he ought to have his operator throw a slide on the screen demanding order. The best thing he can do, however, is to laugh with his audience, which he cannot help doing, anyway, provided his sense of humor has not become atrophied. He has every right to do some tall thinking after the audience gets through with its laughter, but while the storm is raging and the patrons jeer at the hero and roar at the heroine he can do nothing better than join in the laugh and look as if he realized that "the drinks were on him."

Really and truly, there are few funnier things than a melodrama fresh from the cheap studios of Italy, where the hero works for a dollar a day and the adventuress must pay for her own cigarettes. Have you noticed that they never employ young girls in these melodramas, but rather stout old ladies? I do not know why this is so; perhaps the ladies are not so old, after all, but simply victims of premature development aided by a Southern climate and a farinaceous diet. Howsoever this may be, the ladies are mostly suffering from an irreparable loss of waistline. They are invaluable in realistic and boisterous melodrama because they are natural shock-absorbers. They can fall from the roof and they need not land on their feet to escape injury: they are well-upholstered throughout.

To get back to this melodrama, which was actually laughed and jeered to a finish: It was all about an heiress. The girl, like any common working girl, needed protection; so the mother gave her into the keeping of a prize-fighter, who, the title told us in Ollendorfiam English, was the "Champion of the World." He looked more like a waiter recently translated from a dirty street in Naples to a spaghetti dispensary in Via Mulberry. Any American newsboy of twelve could surely have knocked him out in one round; but, then, he wore a sporty-looking cap, and in Italy that is enough of an identification with any branch of athletic sport. It was his duty to save the heiress, and this particular heiress needed saving for five reels. It seems that Lord George was after the heiress. George needed the money, and what does he do but hire a colored prize-fighter to kidnap the heiress.

In the first reel there was but one kidnapping, and there was a vague dull hope in the audience that this thing could not possibly go beyond two reels. "Ha-ha, ha-ha:" hear all the villains laugh at once, for the joke is on the audience. The saving went on for five thousand feet of film. At the end of the third reel the audience began to get uneasy. With the start of the fourth part the hero began saving the heiress by taking her through a mysterious sewer; and then the fun began.

The heiress refused to stay saved. Not a moment's rest for her. Kidnapped, gagged and imprisoned; one minute climbing down a dangerous ladder, in the next scene enjoying a brief spell of liberty, only to be seized in the dark the next minute and carried off to an abandoned castle, thrown into a dungeon and liberated in the 'steenth scene through the hero, who had entered by means of a secret passage. Enter, two minutes later, the aforesaid villains once more and carry the heiress off into a sewer. Chase through the sewer. Everybody in the list of dramatis personae getting wet, not a dry foot in the tout ensemble. Audience now begins to roar, and every time the heiress gets saved again pandemonium breaks loose and veritable cyclones of mock applause sweep through the theater. Even the operator in his box begins to be affected, and he joins in the general merriment.

This is the funny side of it; but there is another side to the situation which is far from being funny. To the exhibitor there are no elements of humor or nourishment in this sort of thing. He is paying good money for something which should never have been shown to any audience outside of Southern Italy. No one admires the Italian producers more than I do. I think the whole industry is everlastingly indebted to the great studios in Rome and Turin and Milan.

We must, however, make a stand against the cheap Italian melodrama. A bit of a threadbare plot is stretched into five reels and filled with all the old "mellerdramatic" props, which have lost their pulling power long ago even in Brooklyn and Yonkers.

To The Moving Picture World, which has hammered away at the cheap and nasty melodrama these many years, the attitude of an East Side audience toward this cheap melodrama is most gratifying. We mortals get discouraged unless we see immediate results. This is especially true in the world of moving pictures. Taking no heed of Wise Mother Nature, who is willing to wait, once the seeds are in the soil, serenely confident of the unfailing harvest we lose patience and scold about the slowness of the turtle. We cannot follow the vast sweep of the world's pendulum nor fathom the order according to which the pendulum must swing. Many a time it seemed a hopeless task to hit away at the cheap melodrama on the screen, for the cheap melodrama seemed as strong as ever despite all we could do to drive it from the screen. Now when we see the temples where the Blaney version of dramatic art once flourished either desolate and for rent or given over to the exhibition of motion pictures we realize that we have not labored in vain.

More pleasing still is the attitude of the average moving picture audience toward the exaggerated melodrama a l'Italiano. There is merit in some of our old-fashioned American melodrama, such as the "Old Homestead" and "Silver King," but there is no merit whatever in the cheap Italian or German or English or French melodrama with its sickening mixture of blood and filth.

The functions of existing semi-official censorship do not extend to the elimination of this species of screen abuse. The elimination must come through the exhibitor, who has it in his power to reject such "features," for I am glad to say that in none of the organized groups of producers have these builders of the cheap foreign melodrama been able to find shelter. They are free lances, but they can do a great deal of harm nevertheless unless the discriminating exhibitor puts up the bars against any and all of their stuff. The duty of discrimination is one which the exhibitor cannot avoid or shift. He owes it both to himself and to his patrons. The habit of taking for granted whatever an enthusiastic booking agent sees fit to tell, is to be discouraged. There is but one way to insure certain knowledge, and that is the demonstration on the screen. Look closely at trade-marks and make yourself familiar with products and reputations.

The Gezabo

By Louis Reeves Harrison

THOSE of us who were fortunate enough to have academic parents may recall the days when father wrote a world-pivotal communication to the local paper about the way things ought to be run in our town and signed his article "Pro Bono Publico." Such articles were intended, rather than adapted, to attract attention and stir public feeling. They were written from a viewpoint so lofty, so remote, so isolated, so superlatively intellectual that they appeared to substitute their own tendencies for those of the human race.

Now the average common ordinary individual is neither a Gezabo nor a clam. He is neither perched on a far mountain top nor wholly engaged in pushing through the mud for what there is in it. He knows that he is faulty and that others are even more so. He realizes that he has his good qualities and concedes that others may have some of the same kind. He is still worried about his carcass and what covers it, but—there is no longer any doubt about it—his sole distinguishing characteristic in the animal kingdom is not that of walking on two legs. He has a consciousness of objects other than those made known to him through the senses—he has imagination.

It is up to the motion-picture director who knows his business to concern himself with pleasing the eye in this particular form of presentation, for it is one designed to quicken sympathy with a minimum of mental exertion. Beautiful scenes are necessary. They cannot replace nature, and they are not so intended, but they act powerfully on the imagination of an audience, especially when they harmonize with the underlying idea. The director is best equipped for his work who grasps the environment of his production and gives it suitable atmosphere.

It is very essential that he should project the picture upon the screen of his own mind before he attempts to arrange for its presentation to an audience, and this not only involves attention to settings and details of costume, but to the strong points in characters and to the personality of types selected for the composite portrayal. This is his definite function. When he attempts, in addition to the duties of his office, to soar away from them to the distant perch of the playwright, his appeal to the imagination is usually without profit to it. He becomes, in other words, a Gezabo.

An experience in directing successful productions taught me that whatever is bound to be one man's business can best be performed by devotion to the specific work in hand. Few of us have the ability of Washington to create an army and administer a government with equal fidelity to both, and this is getting to be more and more an age of specialists. If I was to put on a production of my own today, rather than take on the self-satisfied impression that I had a Gezabo's comprehensive sweep of the situation, I would try to secure the services of the best director available for that specific part of the work he is supposed to be qualified to contribute to general success.

What we are after now is a quality of production that will constitute an advance over that of the past, and we need directors who are not ossified when in a Gezabo-like attitude on some inaccessible height of self-appreciation. We have had a lot of photodramas that audiences of their period might have thoroughly enjoyed, which deal with topics no longer in the public mind, which are nevertheless more or less mildly interesting to any deuterostomatous part of the audience engaged in archaeological research, but we are sadly in need of great stories of today, of experiences as they are, as big and broad-minded men know them, as real playwrights can formulate them. Gezabo plays, even when they are made over from some splendid novel, pertain largely to that branch of knowledge which takes cognizance only of past civilizations.

The archaic photodrama of the Gezabo may be high above the frenzied photoplay of the clam, but neither is destined to be more than a stepping stone in the natural growth and progression of the New Art. Neither contains the material to profoundly affect either our social economy, our artistic development or our spiritual expansion. We need moving plays instead of contemplative ones, and what moves us is what concerns us at the present moment, or is likely to have a bearing on our happiness in the near future. Such creations need not be expected from directors who are giving their best efforts to the specific work they have in hand. Forces behind the dramas we are living need profound study, and they can only be brought to light and given form suitable for presentation on the stage or the screen by those engaged in that particular work, by those especially qualified to write plays.

We are dealing with half measures in expecting a man employed to visualize the product of genius to be author and actor as well as plot out the movement and superintend the presentation to be photographed. That is an imperfect manner of producing and inadequate to attain the end desired by all who are interested in moving pictures. The Wise Gezabo who attempts from this time on to convert a busy director into a jackass of all trades will find out before another year has passed that he has been standing in the light of his own concern's dividends.

In no other business does a live manager expect to buy diamonds at the price of glass, and it is a very essential part of his business to discriminate between a genuine play and its shrewd imitation. Because nearly all of us are workers there is little to fear from decadence in our life as a people, but we are constantly struggling with our environment, battling to rise above our own limitations, and therein lies one of the secrets for the discriminating selector of plays to have well in mind in his search for a really great drama of our times.

It will not require any form of intellectual gymnastics for the people in front to grasp a play of this kind. Its purpose is that which has deeply interested us at one time or another in religion, government or education—the elevation of humankind. Not one of you that has a child or is bent on self-improvement would not sit up and take notice if a strong drama involving some such motive was adequately presented. That purpose is in the heart of millions of people besides yourselves. It animates our daily activities, and there is no need of the playwright going up in a mountain summer-house to gaze at the people. The way to understand them is to stay in the ranks.

If we are to have great plays of the lives we are living, of the dramas in which we are playing a part, thrown on the screen, let us hold to real phenomena, to ourselves as the integral and interesting part of what is going on, and thank the Designer of what we enjoy that we are all the more self-respecting because we stay fighting in the ranks, close down to the pulsing and throbbing of the universal heart.

"The Power of Conscience"

(Essanay)

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

IN "The Power of Conscience," which is scheduled for release August 22, by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, we have a two-reel subject that will commend itself not only to the great public of the moving picture theater world, but to people of finer critical tastes, who are zealous for the future of the photodrama and of photodramatic art. In his production of this subject, Director Wharton gives a closely knit, clearly told story, and in his care of the details he has been Argus-eyed. Double exposure is resorted to frequently during the action of the photodrama, and always with fine effect.

The cast is particularly well assigned. Though Francis X. Bushman clearly dominates the scenes in which he appears, in the role of the Rev. Stanley Waters, one does not lose sight of the merits of his co-workers. The impression never leaves one that the acting of everyone in the cast is in concert with all the others, and that this has resulted from persevering rehearsals under Director Wharton's eye. Take, for example, the scene showing the minister's lecture in the small village hall. Watch the faces of the listeners and of the murderer. There you have a fine study, in facial expressions, of the emotions excited by the words of the man of God. "Conscience is the terror of evil doers; the great avenger of all wrong," says the preacher. Note the burning, feverish eyes of the murderer, and the abject terror on his features as the words fall on his ears. Look at each of the others in turn. In every case, though different, the features are intelligently responsive to the mental workings of the individual, and the latter are subordinate to the influence of the speaker. The pictures show all these things more realistically than the dramatic stage could ever hope to do.

Scene from "The Power of Conscience" (Essanay).

Mr. Bushman's characterization of the minister will always remain a model of its kind. He is ever reverent, though intensely moved by the crime that has robbed him of a brother. Instinctively he can place his hand on the murderer, but he seeks to avenge the foul deed by redeeming the guilty one, rather than by making him suffer for it in the flesh. He is patient and long suffering, and in the end risks his own life to save that of the man whose crime he abhors, in order to bring him to the footstool of Divine mercy. In the death scene, in which the murderer confesses his guilt, the minister rises to a lofty height of spiritual exaltation that positively thrills the spectator. In his fine impersonation of the Rev. Stanley Waters, Mr. Bushman reminds me of the character of the venerable priest, in "Sunshine," so vividly portrayed by my old friend, the late Harry Cashman.

Byron Waters and Edward Hale aspire to the hand of pretty Dora Gordon. Dora is the daughter of farmer Gordon, in a small mining village. Byron is time-keeper at the mine and Hale is a sturdy miner.

Farmer Gordon surprises his daughter and Byron in a tender love scene, and orders the latter to cease his attentions. Hale, who has been rejected by Dora, is overjoyed at this and continues to nurse his malice for his hated rival. Byron, after his stormy experience with farmer Gordon, resolves to take a short vacation and visit his mother and his brother, the Rev. Stanley Waters. He leaves a letter for Dora, in a hole in the big oak tree, asking her to meet him at the tree one night to say good-by. Hale watches Byron deposit the note and secures it.

Scene from "The Power of Conscience" (Essanay).

Now it chanced that farmer Gordon had his chicken roost robbed the night before Byron left his note in the oak tree, and to protect himself against the thieves, he fixed a loaded shot gun so that an intruder would discharge it at his bodily risk. Hale saw the farmer set the gun trap, and a foul crime enters his mind. He forges Dora's name to a note, in which Byron is asked to meet her at the chicken house that night. As a result Byron is shot.

Dora suspects Hale, and on the arrival of Byron's brother, the Rev. Stanley Waters, to investigate the cause of his death, Dora gives him her aid. Some time afterwards, Hale is entombed in the mine by an explosion of gas and the minister saves his life. Before his death, due to injuries, Hale confesses to his rescuer that he had lured Byron to his death, in order to make the way clear for himself, in securing favor from Dora.

PATHE LEAD TALKS SHOP.

Williams, of the Pathe company, has been doing the wilds of Pittsburgh and vicinity, talking pictures and delighting big audiences during the last week. Williams has a dandy little lecture, full of good stories of studio happenings, and replete with the genuine kind of humor and wit that takes in Western Pennsylvania, and is acceptable anywhere in the country. The Cameraphone Lecture Bureau introduced Mr. Williams to Pittsburgh, and his first appearances were made in the Cameraphone Theaters.

GEORGE KLEINE GIVES FREE ENTERTAINMENT.

That clubs and similar organizations in Chicago find a ready response with George Kleine for equipment and film for any kind of a charitable work seems well evidenced by the constant string of "Windy City" organizations that are the recipients of his generosity. Last week The Columbia Yacht Club was given all equipment for the running of an eight-reel show for the benefit of charity. The Vitagraph Company also supplied some of the reels used.

"Everyman" (Kinemacolor)

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

INTERMIXED with a particularly bad vaudeville program of the anthropoid variety I saw this splendid feature one of the Proctor houses in this city. I cannot know on what system amusement is fed to the patrons of this theater, but I do know that the contrast between the fine old play and the acts of junior vaudeville was violent and painful. If "Everyman" was welcome food to any considerable portion of the audience the vaudeville acts must have been like whiffs from Barren Island.

"Everyman" is a most creditable attempt to revive what is of permanent, artistic and moral value in the old so-called morality play. The morality play was the only form of dramatic entertainment during the absolute sway of the Church in the Middle Ages. As its name implies it aimed more at moral teaching than perfection of dramatic form. It was inevitable for this style of entertainment to drift into the allegorical, and right here must always be found its greatest value for the modern adapter. "Everyman" is a dramatic allegory of no mean power.

Allegory is easily translated into the language of the screen if the allegorical figures are fittingly embodied and their action is properly curtailed. I am glad to say that in this Kinemacolor production these two essentials for a successful screening of allegory have been well understood and are most ably carried out. The leading part of "Everyman" is in very competent hands, the costuming and the bearing of the character leaving nothing to be desired. This is true also of every other one of the embodiments in the story. The figure of Death was absurdly grotesque to the eye behind the modern mind, but it is altogether acceptable in a play of this kind and any other representation on more modern lines would have hurt the pleasant illusion which is of the essence of the play itself. A glimpse of the ecclesiastical character and origin of the play is the fine figure of Confession which plainly betrayed the theologian in the author or authors whoever they may have been. The story like the story of every morality play is simplicity itself: "Everyman" summoned by Death seeks to prepare for the long journey and is eager for companions to go with him to the gate of eternity. He finds that there is no reliance on aught which is worldly and one by one Riches, Strength, Beauty, Kindred, Fellowship, etc., turn from him and only Knowledge and Good Deeds offer some help, but the final salvation comes through Confession and Repentance.

The play is entitled to further praise by reason of its clear titles, all of them evidently taken from some good version of the old drama and all of them forceful and impressive in their simple Saxon garb. The music did a good deal for "Everyman." It was suitable throughout and it was played with remarkable skill. The music, indeed, was as welcome to the audience as the fine old play itself, for at the end of every musical number there came a strong burst of applause. This shows incidentally how much our moving picture patrons appreciate good music and how a generous musical program of consistently good quality would reconcile our public, no less than the public of England and Germany, to higher prices of admission.

"The Black Snake"

A Three Reel Melodrama of Russian Life, Now Being Exploited by the Apex Film Co.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

Perhaps it isn't very nice to call a lady a black snake, but in this case she happens to be a serpentine dancer of the brunette type, hence the title fits to a certain extent. It is not certain whether this is her stage name or a nick name. At any rate her regular name is Zadija, and she is employed at a circus in the Russian capitol to do her act. She is more than a dancer; she is also a secret agent for a revolutionary society.

In the next dressing room to her is a bareback artist answering to the name of Blanche. The love of these two women for the same man is what starts all the trouble. Blanche is an innocent party to all this, and Zadija is the principal disturber. Ivan, the man they both love, is a high born Russian, connected secretly with the police department. Zadija would overlook this willingly were it not for the fact that he frequently passes her by to call on Blanche in her dressing room. She contrives to trump up false evidence against Blanche that brings about her arrest and makes Ivan think that Blanche is plotting against him. After this, Zadija easily lures Ivan to the revolutionary headquarters, where there is more trouble in store for him. Olaf the revolutionary chief is in love with Zadija and he makes it warm for Ivan but Zadija sticks to Ivan and they agree to marry. Meanwhile D'Olton, the famous detective, is on the case and traces them there. When he gets enough facts he sends for Blanche and shows Zadija up as a conspirator. Ivan then denounces her and makes up with Blanche.

In the working out of this story there are more thrilling episodes crowded into the space of three reels than anyone would imagine. One of these is the flight of Blanche from the police when she makes her escape through the dome of the circus roof with the officers in pursuit. Another thrilling incident is the drive of detective D'Olton through the snow and the attack upon him by hungry wolves. This is a very realistic and unusual piece of motion picture work and one that calls for special praise. There is also introduced a bona fide representation of a European indoor circus. The picture also gives a good insight into the workings of the Russian police system. The last scene, where the two women meet, is handled effectively. Zadija is admiring herself in a mirror, happy in the thought that Blanche is dead. As she gazes into the glass the features of Blanche appear over her shoulder. Zadija in rage and fear breaks the mirror and turns to find herself in a trap.

Scene from "The Black Snake" (Apex).

For those who like their melodrama served in an undiluted state, this is a good picture. It ought to please most anyone who loves sensational pictures and who does not bother much about probabilities.

EXCLUSIVE AGENTS FOR THE COAST.

Agents representing Sol Lesser, head of the Golden Gate Film Exchanges, the Pacific Feature Film Exchanges, the Northwestern Feature Film Co., and who is also affiliated with Miles Bros., are now touring the United States with a view of contracting for the exclusive handling of the feature program of the Exclusive Supply Corporation in other territories. Ohio, Indiana and Kentucky, and the Colorado and the Kansas group of states are under consideration.

The Northwestern Feature Film Co. recently opened with offices at 329 Oak Street, Portland, Ore., and at 1216 Third Avenue, was the result of a consolidation between the Lesser interests with those of Miles Bros. Lesser's Golden Gate Exchanges and Pacific Feature Film Exchanges are at 234 Eddy Street, San Francisco, and 514 West 8th Street, Los Angeles. Miles Bros. also have exchanges in both cities.

Among the brands exclusively controlled for the Far West states are Gaumont, Itala, Solax, Gaumont Weekly and Great Northern.

FRANCIS POWERS TO DIRECT FOR RELIANCE.

The force of Reliance stage directors has been strengthened by the addition of Francis Powers, formerly of Pathe Freres and late director for the Universal Company.

Mr. Powers is a man of broad experience in stage craft, being well known as an actor and as an author before he entered the moving picture field. For several years he was associated with David Belasco, making a number of valuable contributions to the dramatic stage as a playwright. He quickly gained recognition as a moving picture director of ability in which capacity he will begin work for the Reliance on Monday, August 11th, his first picture production being a serious drama entitled "The Hardest Way," which will be released early in September.

"Grandmother's Lamp" (Ambrosio)

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

DESPITE its peaceful title, this production is full of pictures of war and of adventures and romantic incidents with a most pleasing admixture of pathos and simple love. Grandmother was the idol of her little grandchildren. The latter had often wondered why grandmother seemed so much attached to an old-fashioned, dingy-looking oil lamp and meaning to give her a pleasant surprise they present her with a pretty little electric lamp. The electric lamp would shine much more brightly and grandmother would never again be bothered with trimming the wick or keeping the globe filled with oil. Grandmother thanks the little chaps for their thoughtfulness, but declines the present for she says the old oil lamp reminds her of her own youthful romance and of the stirring days when Italy at last drove the foreign invader from her soil. Presently the picture of the sweet old lady talking to her grandchildren fades from the screen and we are plunged into the bitter and bloody conflict between the armies of Austria and Italy.

Scene from "Grandmother's Lamp" (Ambrosio).

I will let the synopsis tell the rest of the story only pausing to remark here that the lamp hung up in the tower of a village church became the signal for an Italian attack upon the Austrians, the latter suffering a complete defeat. The bright glare of the lamp in the tower is shown with remarkable fidelity to life and is one of the many fine points of this splendid feature. All the battle scenes are done with extraordinary skill and the uniforms of the contending armies are as picturesque as they are true to history. It is evident that the fighting was done under the direction of a strategic expert. There are half a dozen stirring moments in every one of the three reels and the interest in the story told so rapidly and excitingly does never lag for an instant. Nor is there lacking the element of humor. Bubbles, the orderly, does a number of clever and daring things in a genuinely funny way and adds much to the success of the feature. The acting is uniformly good, the photography maintains the Ambrosio standard of excellence and the settings are varied and impressive. On the whole I should say that this feature is above the average in merit.

"THE THANHOUSER TWINS" BACK.

"The Thanhouser Twins," as they are called, will shortly reappear in the New Rochelle pictures, after a long absence. They were with a theatrical production the past season. C. J. Hite gave them the high sign and they are occupying a Thanhouser dressing room once more.

They open the return date with a two-reel drama called "Life's Pathway," which Lloyd Lonergan wrote particularly for them. Tom Heffron put the piece on. At the Thanhouser studio last year, Lucius Henderson directed the twins and he got so well acquainted with them, he could call either one by her right name. Cash bets are being laid on the possibilities of Director Heffron's duplicating this feat. It's nice for a director to know which twin he wants to call down. Just one other Thanhouserite "got" the twins by their proper names last year. This was the cashier. On salary day they always made themselves clear to her.

The Crime on the Coast

An Artistic Three-Reel Production by the Societe Film d' Art.

Reviewed By Hugh Hoffman.

The Societe Film d' Art, as many people know, is an association of high class French actors who produce their own plays whenever the spirit moves them, at intervals between their regular stage engagements. The excellence of their work is well known, and this offering is no exception to the high standard of merit that usually characterizes their work.

Scene from "The Crime on the Coast" (Film d' Art).

It is a real pleasure to sit through a picture in which there are no abhorrent vacuums. The hand of the artist is visible in the very first scene and appears consistently through all that follows. Every move and every detail is carefully accounted for, with the result that the picture is a well rounded entity with no loose ends and nothing to confuse the observer. It is complete; done; finished, and therefore, pleasing.

Scene from "The Crime on the Coast" (Film d' Art).

"The Crime on the Coast" is adapted from the novel "La Petite Fifi" by Henri Demesse. Briefly, it tells of the wayward son of a fisherman who has gotten into debt. His father, to help him out, sends for a wealthy friend, named Burrows, living in town. The wife of Burrows is secretly in love with a villanious Greek nobleman. The Greek follows Burrows to the fisherman's shanty and shoots him through a window. Before he expires, Burrows writes who shot him on the fly leaf of a book. The old fisherman is sent to prison and dies there. His drunken son later finds the accusation in the book and uses it to blackmail the Greek. The Greek buys it but Blanche, the daughter of Burrows, steals it from him. On the day that her mother is to become the bride of the Greek, Blanche produces the evidence and he goes to a cell instead of a bridal chamber.

Acted as it is by prominent people of the French stage the dramatic work is very strong and finely sustained. The backgrounds, both interior and exterior are well chosen and help greatly to give the picture the touch of real art that it contains. It is satisfying and well worth seeing. The Film d' Art Company, of America, is marketing the picture in this country.

Film War Scene On Lubin Estate.

Thrilling and Realistic "Battles" Fought Near Banks of Schuylkill Where Dramas Are Made.

War, shorn of its repellent features but otherwise as thrilling and realistic as the real article, was viewed not long ago by Philadelphians for the price of a railroad ticket to Betzwood Manor, the big country estate of Siegmund Lubin, on the banks of the Schuylkill River. The estate contains 500 acres, two miles of water front on the Schuylkill River, more than 150 Texas bronchos, fifty head of fine Jersey cows, sheep, pigs, chickens and dogs galore. There are also geese, ducks, pigeons and turkeys, all of which manage to get into the limelight of the film occasionally.

Several thousand boys, girls and their parents flocked to Betzwood Manor recently when a big battle picture was to be taken. The weather was clear and absolutely perfect for the camera men and players. The military display was imposing, nearly a thousand men, in war begrimed uniforms, were camped with wonderful realism tents, commissary departments, hundreds of horses and ten big guns. Siegmund Lubin, Ira M. Lowery and Colonel Joe Smiley directed the taking of the picture of which five realistic scenes were run off for the battery of a score of cameras.

The din and crack of musketry and roar of the big guns was deafening. Men and horses dropped as if dead, while others rode over them, fighting to the last ditch. The cheers of the visitors could be heard for a mile and Joe Smiley who played General Grant, come near losing his whiskers and all of his buttons in the mad rush of congratulations. The cameras being stopped, the pickets permitted the visitors to close in and hunt the field over for souvenirs, shells of the bombs, old bayonets, etc. These were eagerly seized upon.

The Lubin Manor has two beautiful resident buildings and a conservatory and several other buildings such as stables, lodge house and servants' quarters. Crossing to the farm, the housing of the stock is a marvel of protection and care. The horses and cows are finely stabled. The sheep pens, pig pens, chicken houses and dog kennels are a marvel of convenience and comfort. Hundreds of pigeons, ducks, geese and turkeys enjoy the freedom of the grounds and water front.

The grounds are always open to the public and Seigmund Lubin is very proud to see the crowds of visitors who usually on Sunday, take advantage of an outing to Betzwood Manor. Mr. Lubin says it costs $50,000 a year to keep up the estate, but believes it is worth that for the advantage of the scenic atmosphere so necessary to the taking of big out-of-door and water scenes.

HOW BIG COMPANIES FIGHT ILLEGITIMATE COMPETITION.

"What is called competition has caused us a great deal of trouble," says George Kleine in an interview with The Cleveland Plain Leader for July 27. "Some of us who care to engage in purely legitimate transactions and put $100,000 into a great feature film will find that our idea is stolen bodily by some small firm, a fake film is offered the public and we are in danger of losing much of the value of our advertising. They even try to steal actors away after half the picture is made, knowing that the entire play will have to be restaged. To counteract this, one of the largest films ever made, for which I shall have American rights, is entirely unknown to the actors. They are told to do this and that without any exact knowledge of the name of the play."

Charles J. Brabin.

In the ranks of Motion Picture Directors, there are few, if any, who have risen to the top more quickly, or have achieved more notable success than Charles J. Brabin of the Edison studio. Born in Liverpool, England, in 1882, he came to America in 1903, and after a varied career in ordinary business lines, such as hotel clerk, traveling salesman, etc., he entered the theatrical field, his first engagement being with George Ade's "College Widow" in which he played for two seasons. After several years with the "legit," part of which time was spent as stage manager for various productions, Mr. Brabin decided that the motion pictures presented a larger and more attractive field, and he became connected with the Edison Company, as an actor, his first part being an impersonation of Abraham Lincoln. His career as an actor was a short one, however, as Mr. Plimpton, Manager Negative Production, soon recognized the fact that in Mr. Brabin he had found the man to fill a long-felt want, and the position of stage manager was offered him, which he accepted.

Charles J. Brabin, Edison Director Now With Company of Players in England.

In his new position, his native talent for artistic creations was given full scope, and the rich settings and fidelity to detail for which Edison productions are so justly famous are due, in a great measure, to his genius and untiring efforts. Endowed with that "British Bull Dog" tenacity which lies at the bottom of so many of his countrymen's attainments, he delved deeply into the literature and art of all periods and nations, with the result that, no matter what kind of story was decided on for production, he was always prepared with the correct furniture, costumes, arms or accoutrements to make the picture an artist's success.

After about two years in the position of stage manager, Mr. Brabin was given his well-earned promotion to the position of director, in which he rapidly made a new name for himself, applying the same hard study and careful attention to details which characterized his previous efforts. With a thorough knowledge of camera work in all its details which he had absorbed during his career as stage manager, some of the pictures which he has turned out have been positively startling in the weird effects produced by the use of double and triple exposures, novel lighting, and ingenious mechanical contrivances. One of the most notable of these "uncanny" pictures was "The Awakening of John Bond," in which he showed an old man, a paralytic, visited by a spirit (Conscience), and his astral body rising from his material self and going back through the incidents of his past life, seeing the misery caused by his grasping and selfish business career, and in the end being brought to make restitution to those he had injured. Throughout the picture both the material and astral body of "John Bond" are shown on the screen at the same time with startling realism.

On another occasion, seeking a thrilling situation, he had Miss Fuller lowered from a sixth-story window in an apartment house, and undoubtedly succeeded in getting the "thrill." After the scene was over, Miss Fuller said she was glad to have done it, but—"Never Again."

Scene from "The Coast Guard's Sister"—Miss Miriam Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott in Leading Roles.

Mr. Brabin is now in England for the purpose of making a number of pictures of English, Scotch, Irish and Welsh stories in which the real atmosphere will add a decided interest. Mr. Marc MacDermott and Miss Miriam Nesbitt of the regular Edison Stock Co., play the principal parts in these stories, assisted by a company of English players.

Mr. Brabin is a successful writer of scenarios as well as producer, having written such well-known stories as "The Unsullied Shield," "All for the Love of a Lady" and others.

One of the productions recently comoleted by the company in Mr. Brabin's charge is entitled "The Coast Guard's Sister." It was taken on the coast of Cornwall, England, and the principal parts were played by Miss Nesbitt and Marc MacDermott. One of the best scenes is shown in the accompanying illustration.

MALING DRESSES FAMOUS PLAYERS.

A rather unique arrangement is the reason for this item. Some time ago the Famous Players Film Co. engaged exclusively for their purposes the house of A. E. Lawrence, one of the best theatrical costume concerns in the business and the oldest one in New York City. This concern consented to devote all its stock, costumes and make-up to the needs of the Famous Players, and E. V. Maling, who had been its manager for ten years, transferred his headquarters to the Famous Players studio where he has since been busy dressing the characters in the successful manner so universally recognized.

"THE WONDERFUL TOPPERWEINS" FILMED.

Recently at the South Shore Country Club, Chicago, the Wonderful Topperweins presented their shooting act before a battery of moving picture cameras. The results is a film entitled "The Wonderful Topperweins," which shows these skilled shooters performing amazing stunts with rifle, pistol and shotgun. On the same reel are scenes showing a bird's eye view of the Winchester Repeating Arms Company plant at New Haven and the 6000 Winchester employees pouring out of the gates a few seconds behind the noon hour whistle.

"The Wonderful Topperweins" film was made by the Industrial Moving Picture Company, of Chicago, and because Winchester arms and ammunition were used exclusively the cost of the negative was defrayed by the Winchester Company, who take this opportunity of showing, by means of moving pictures, just what can be done by a good shot with a good rifle properly loaded.

This film is presented to the public in general and is also being exhibited under the auspices of gun clubs generally.

"The Invaders"

A Western Village Rises In Its Wrath Against Hired Gun Fighters—A Kalem Feature.

H. C. Judson.

WE can promise a big punch in a coming three-part special picture by Kalem. It is entitled, "The Invaders," and is an illustration of a very popular novel of that name by John Lloyd. It deals with the antagonism between cowmen, who have been depending on a wild country to feed their herds, and homesteaders, who fence off sections of grazing land and places where cattle can drink. Cowmen and farmers can't live together; to have the homesteaders come means death to the cattlemen's business, so, by their very necessities, a fight is inevitable.

The story takes sides with the farmers, as it was necessary to take one side or the other in a drama. Its object is first to work up indignation in the spectator against the cowmen. It makes him warmly partisan by getting him acquainted with a lot of good fellows, friends of the hero, who are homesteaders. The hero is like the average spectator, a tenderfoot who has come to Wyoming in 1892, at a time when lands, grazed over by cattle, are opened to the general public as homestead lands and he meets these others, Westerners, brave and honorable like himself. He had loved a girl in New York; but her father had refused him and that is why he has come west.

Scene from "The Invaders" (Kalem).

There is now introduced a character called, "The Killer," a ruthless bully who shoots from behind or from ambush and shoots straight. This man is not a cowman; they are not evil men at first, but when they decide to go to all lengths against the homesteaders, they become evil and employ this "Killer" and others like him. Having such a character outside of the chief parties to the central struggle keeps us from losing interest in the cowmen. The author has further kept them human by making the father of the heroine a cowman, and he and his daughter both come out to the scene of the coming struggle.

Meanwhile the "Killer" has come in contact with the hero. And now another character is introduced, a woman, and called "the Sage Hen." The "Killer" loves her and sees that the hero is very friendly with her. Two developments come from this. First, the hero is shown as able to take care of himself and more than a match for the bully, so long as he is on his guard. Second, it provides a path for the climax. Soon the bully, being in the employ of the cattlemen, will be twice as dangerous as before and since he is to be employed by the cattlemen to kill the hero, he will have every reason to be efficient and fervent in business. When we see it start, we begin to fear for the hero.

To help their servant "the Killer," the cowmen employ a hundred gun fighters from Texas to come up and wipe out the homesteaders and especially the hero, who lives in his shack with two hired hands. The Sage Hen knows that the bully is going to make that lonely shack the first undertaking of his army of toughs. She really loves the hero and sends asking him to call and see her about some legal business that is troubling her. She makes the mistake of putting her arms about him before telling him of the danger. He has seen the New York girl in the village and won't even read the "Killer's" letter. In despair, she follows and reaches his shack before him. The gun fighters come before he does. He is warned by a neighbor, but one against a hundred can do nothing. The two hired men are killed and the Sage Hen, in trying to escape, is shot by the "Killer" who thinks she is the hero. When he finds out his mistake, he wants revenge. There is a chase of all after the hero who takes refuge in the house where the girl from New York and her rich father are staying and the financier forces the "Killer" to cease his persuit. Yet the dramatic balance between the financier and the bully still swings undecidedly and, for a moment, it looks as though the latter is going to get our friend in spite of the rich man's commands.

Up till now we have been growing more and more indignant; but here we are repaid with an uplift of exultation. The village has been warned that the hundred roughs are making war in the valley and we see them rise as one man and swoop down upon the villains. The sight gives us a regular Bunker Hill feeling. The homesteaders are not strong enough to settle the affair without difficulty. They are still in hot battle when Uncle Sam's soldiers, who have been warned, ride upon the scene and separate the two parties. The pleasant ending is seen coming.

It is a well staged picture. The players do commendable, natural work, but with no real character drawings, although "the Killer," by Paul Hurst, will be surely noticed. It is effective. Jane Wolfe, as the Sage Hen, is also good in her emotional work, but perhaps not so clear in her character drawing as usual. She is one of the really strong actresses. Marin Sais plays the heroine with her usual charm and is very natural in this role. Carlyle Blackwell is also very good in his part, the hero; but we have liked him more in other roles. William West is the financier; Charles French, his foreman (a good choice for the role); James Horne, "Uncle Billy," a friendly rancher; Knute Rahmn and Rhys Pryce are two western characters. It is an offering full of excitement, with spacious theme in its story of big things, out of doors. Even a critical audience will enjoy it.

BLACHÉ AMERICAN FEATURES.

Herbert Blaché, formerly vice-president of the Gaumont Company, and now affiliated with Madame Blaché in the production of Solax regulars and features, has announced a new brand of features to be released beginning with September under the trade mark of "Blaché American Features." It is his plan to produce three, four and five reel classical adaptations as well as sensational and melodramatic modern subjects. All the features will be produced under Mr. Blaché's personal direction and management with the co-operation of his talented wife.

In talking about his plans for the future, Mr. Blaché said, "The demand has been very insistent for more Solax features than the number being released. The remarkable success Solax has had with "The Beasts of the Jungle," "Dick Whittington and His Cat," "Kelly from the Emerald Isle," and "The Pit and the Pendulum," all of which were closed out for the entire country, is an indication of the demand and popularity for our productions. While Solax will continue to produce its features under the direction and supervision of Madame Blaché and my advice, I personally, however, will guide the destinies of the new brand. Our stock companies will be entirely separate and distinct as well as the other departments of our organization. In the production of our features, we expect to use some Broadway stars in the leading roles as well as the plays produced on the legitimate stage. We have made some very satisfactory arrangements in those directions and we have under preparation some very remarkable productions which will be announced shortly."

NEW PICTURE COMPANY ORGANIZED.

Tampa Films, Incorporated, is the name of a new picture concern recently organized at Tampa, Fla. It is being financed by a number of the leading citizens and banks of Southern Florida and its officers and promoters are H. C. Dorsey, president; Salvador V. M. Ybor, vice-president; B. F. Borchardt, secretary; Jerome Waterman, treasurer; Captain Banavita, managing director, and Frank Whitman, producing director. Mr. Dorsey is vice-president of the Montgomery Amusement Company.

The new company will manufacture wild animal three and four reel subjects. The present offices of the company are at American National Bank, Tampa, Fla.

"The Black Sheep."

A Fight For an Inheritance Is the Theme of a Good Union Feature Offering.

THERE is not a great deal of strength in the bare story told in this three-reel picture by Union Feature Releases, entitled, "The Black Sheep, or a Fight For an Inheritance;" but it has been so carefully produced in all things and the acting is so full of humanity and truth that the eye is deceived; the action seems natural while we watch it. The characterizations are wonderful. Perhaps that of John, the steward, by M. Neviste, will excite the most admiration. It is a sly, crafty man who knows when he is in clover, but who doesn't question fate too closely; is willing to take the good and lick his chops and not bother his conscience. He is just the man to give way to the pressure of the evil nephew and even, being afraid to lose his comfortable life, steal the will which disinherits that nephew.

M. Russel's picture of the nephew, the "Black Sheep," is good; but lacks any real "punch" as does Yvonne Pascal's portrayal of the girl which makes her charming and quite natural. It is a good deal to be charming and natural. The picture of Grabber, the money broker, by M. Simon, is, on the other hand, another clear-cut and imaginative character sketch which will also draw attention. The staging of the offering is very commendable; the scenes have been well conceived and the photography clear. The story has very weak places; but it interests in spite of them.

AUTOUR D'UN TESTAMENT

Scene from "The Black Sheep" (Union Feature).

Mrs. Brendon, to save a fortune left by her husband on condition that she remain unmarried, has to conceal the birth of a child. It is a girl and, called the daughter of the woman's steward, grows up to be about eighteen and even the steward doesn't know who she is. The widow has a nephew who is a spendthrift and she refuses to give him any more money, makes a will disinheriting him. This nephew, the "black sheep," has found that the steward (supposed to be the girl's father), is drinking much of the time and that he is systematically dishonest in his accounts. This he keeps from his aunt with the intention of using it to his own advantage. Soon, in desparate need of money, he with an accomplice, forces the steward, by threats of exposure, to steal for him the latest will.

It would have done no good to steal the will while the widow could make another at once, so she had to die. This is accomplished by shock. She is awakened by the entrance of the steward into her room to steal the document and, in her weak condition, is frightened to death. The "Black Sheep" i snow heir to a large part of his aunt's property and she is dead. He should be in receipt of a sum of money; yet it is shown that he has to borrow from Grabber, the money lender and, since he has to use the will as guarantee, it is the means of his undoing; for the broker is crafty and sees to it that there are two envelopes, one with the real will, one with a dummy will. In a day or so (several weeks by what has transpired), there is a struggle in the office of the broker for the will. In this struggle, the villian proves the quicker with his revolver and secures an envelope which he takes home and joyfully burns. To say that this is a powerful story or that it convinced would be not quite true; but this is certain—the picture impresses one as much better than an analysis of its story would lead one to expect.

"In the Coils of the Python."

A Two-Reel Animal Picture by "101" Bison.

Reviewed by Hugh Hoffman.

THE principal claim for credit in this picture should be allowed to Mr. Sherman Bainbridge for permitting a large 35 foot python to coil about him while he lies supposedly fatally injured on the ground. While a well fed python is not apt to be very dangerous, it requires a considerable amount of nerve, just the same, to allow him to make several coils about your body, in the hope that he will not forget his gentlemanly instincts. It's what he might do in such a position that makes it a ticklish job, and in this case there was nothing between Mr. Bainbridge and eternity but the generous disposition of that snake.

This picture has in it several hair raising episodes of people being at close range with savage beasts and reptiles and it is a pity on that account that more care was not given to the preparation of the story. Aside from the thrills furnished by the imminent danger of death by voracious monsters, the plot and the acting are perfunctory, although the settings and photography are good. The entire vitality of the picture is used up in the animal scenes, leaving the remainder to be gone through in a colorless sort of way. It is all right to use wild animals to put the punch in a picture but that is no reason why the acting and the story should be slighted. This is referring to the scenes in which the animals do not appear, and in which no allowance need be made for fear on the part of the actor.

Scene from "In the Coils of the Python" (Bison).

The plot lacks strength and the acting is stereotyped but the animal scenes will probably carry the picture through. It is all about how a British captain, in East India, deserts his wife and goes with another woman into the interior to hunt. The wife goes to some relatives and there meets Clifford, a young officer who falls in love with her. Her little boy wanders away and the searching party runs across numerous tigers before finding the lad. While searching for her boy, the wife comes across her husband (Bainbridge), fatally wounded by a fall from a horse and in the coils of the python. She rescues him from the python but he dies, anyhow, and she is free to marry Clifford. Incidentally Clifford discharges a Hindoo servant and the latter waylays Clifford in the jungle. Before he can kill Clifford, a python kills the Hindoo.

Such is the plot, with all scenes obviously anticipating the python scene. All the characters are ready to jump up at a second's notice and go some where to save somebody, much in the same manner that firemen wait for a practice alarm. The animal scenes are more interesting. There are good glimpses of tigers eating carrion and wandering in the glades; also good studies of the python at close range. One instructive scene shows a tiger-net suspended by poles over a carcass. The tiger knocks against a pole, the net falls on him and he is soon struggling to get out, but the more he struggles, the more hopelessly tangled he becomes. Most tiger-catching is done with nets and this is a good illustration.

Let us have more animal pictures but please keep the story and the acting up to standard.

By JAS. S. McQUADE

EVERY reputable trade paper recognizes the rights of its readers to protection from advertisers who seek personal gain through misrepresentation and false claims. It is extremely difficult to separate the advertising wheat from the advertising chaff at all times; but when designing and dishonest advertisers succeed in securing advertising space, before the true character of their propositions is known, a real hardship results to readers, honest advertisers and the publication itself.

Some of these dishonest advertisers, after being found out, have the brazen effrontery to refer to the space they have taken and the money they have spent to advertise their censurable projects, as if the publication had lent itself as an accessory thereto, at the expense of its good name and the confidence of its readers! One of the most valuable assets of any publication is its recognized policy to inform its readers correctly and to protect them against fraud.

In the moving picture industry there are many opportunities for the deception of exhibitors; and, unfortunately, there are also exhibitors who are only too willing to become a party to the deception of the public, when a fake film subject is offered to them cheaply, at the expense of the bona fide article. The duper, the smuggler and the pirate are still abroad in filmland. They are the camp followers of the army, but the war of extermination has begun.

Exclusive Theaters and Programs for Children.

Special moving picture theater programs for children are destined to be an innovation of the near future in all civilized countries. I was talking the other day to a prominent exhibitor from an important city in the Middle West, and he spoke of the possibility of conducting a theater where nothing but programs for children will be offered. Children will be the high moguls there, but the pictures will be carefully selected, and when not educational they will be strictly confined to such subjects as will amuse and be nowise harmful in their tendency.

The latest Bioscope on hand, July 31, has an interesting article on a series of free educational film demonstrations, arranged by the London Evening News, in conjunction with Pathe Freres Cinema, Limited, and the managers of twenty moving picture theaters of the English metropolis, for school children there. The series is known as the Pathe-Evening News education matinees, and the pictures are being received with remarkable interest by the children.

"When the show commenced, nothing could restrain them," the article states. "Even Mr. Lennox's (the manager) double-size police whistle was impotent against their lusty roars of delight, as they recognized some familiar object on the screen, or watched some novel miracle of nature taking place before them for the first time. Each sub-title was spelled out loudly by the whole throng, no matter whether they could understand its import or not, and it was wonderful to hear mites of seven or eight assisting each other, with valuable explanations, to understand the meaning of the various natural phenomena which the films were revealing to them. They adored the crabs and the star-fishes, and they fairly howled with joy at the pictures of monkey trapping, whilst other deeper subjects, which one might have thought they would fail to understand, were met with almost equal appreciation. In fact, one of the outstanding features of the whole performance was the rapt interest and attention with which everything was followed."

Mr. J. Best, B. Sc., manager of Pathe's educational and scientific department, and one of the originators of the enterprise, talked briefly on each film as it was exhibited.

"Les Miserables" in Chicago.

William Sievers, secretary and treasurer of the New Grand Central, St. Louis, is in the city arranging for the placing of "Les Miserables" in one of the big theaters for a run and for its booking throughout the State, the rights for which are controlled by his company. He is finding some difficulty in arranging a Chicago run owing to the lateness of the season, with the opening of regular attractions close at hand. Present indications are that he will secure either the Garrick or Orchestra Hall.

The presentations of this great nine-reel feature at the New Grand Central were given to crowded houses for 16 days and a return date, of longer duration, has been requested.

Very remarkable, from a newspaper point of view, was the great importance attached to "Les Miserables" by the St. Louis press. In addition to reviews by special writers, lengthy editorials were devoted to the demonstrations.

Chicago Fire Prevention Ordinance.

The fire prevention ordinance affecting Chicago film exchanges, which was passed about the opening of this year, is now being strictly enforced. Many changes have been made in the requirements since then, under such experts as Messrs. Case and Hayda, old fire underwriters of the city and now acting chiefs of fire prevention and public safety. Credit is also due H. L. Vallandigham, manager of the machine and supply department of the Standard Film Exchange, for the zeal and time bestowed on the question of fire protection to exchanges, and to whose suggestions are due several modifications in the original draft of the ordinance.

The ordinance provides as follows for the requirements necessary in order to secure a license to conduct a film exchange in Chicago:

"Install one fire axe on each floor and basement and, in addition to these, one standard two and one-half gallon soda chemical, or one approved one-quart fire extinguisher for each 2,000 square feet of floor area.

"Vault to be ventilated to the outside air by means of an opening having a sectional area of 50 square inches. Vent pipe shall be of metal not less than No. 18 gauge in thickness; shall not expose other property; must be shielded from the weather and provided with a wire screen of not larger than one-quarter inch mesh. Incandescent lights in vaults to be equipped with vapor proof globes.

"Examining and repairing shall be done only in a room having outside ventilation and separated from the balance of the building by tight partitions of incombustible material, with standard doors at openings; partitions and doors shall contain no glass other than wired glass. Said room shall be used neither for the storage nor handling of combustible materials, other than the films.

"Provide standard metal cans for all film scrap. These are cans which have self-closing hinged covers.

"Incandescent lamps in examination room must be hung on reinforced cords and equipped with keyless sockets and vapor-proof globes.

"Provide metal can for all rubbish other than film scrap.

"Post standard NO SMOKING signs in conspicuous places about premises."

All licensed and independent exchanges have already conformed to the requirements, and feature film exchanges outside of the regular exchanges are warned to comply with the ordinance at once, as they will be liable to fine and the possible closing of their premises until all demands of the fire prevention bureau are satisfied.

"King Robert of Sicily" Pleases.

The Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, among numerous letters of approval regarding "King Robert of Sicily," has received the following communication from a citizen of Montreal, Canada: "I have just returned from the Imperial Theater, where I saw your photoplay, 'King Robert of Sicily.'

"I am writing you to thank and congratulate you for producing pictures such as this. In these days of fads and follies, it is very seldom that we see really beautiful pictures.

"The acting is very good, and the setting must have cost thousands. Seldom do we hear applause after a picture has been shown, but the hand clapping that greeted 'King Robert' this evening was very loud and sincere.

"I may appear to you, perhaps, as a moral reformer, or at least eccentric, so I will add that I am just an ordinary office clerk, who liked 'King Robert of Sicily,' and who hopes to see more like it."

Old Chicagoan Mutual District Manager.

J. E. Willis has been appointed district manager of the Middle West by the Mutual Film Corporation, with headquarters in Chicago. His offices will be on the fourth floor of the new Mallers Building, Wabash Avenue and Madison Street, and will be ready for occupancy about August 16 or 17. Mr. Willis announces that these offices will rank among the finest in the country. One of the largest and best equipped private projection rooms in Chicago, seating about 150 people, will be located in the new branch offices.

The Majestic branch of the Mutual, now located in the old Northwestern Building, Lake Street and Fifth Avenue, will move into the Wabash branch on the same date as Mr. Willis. For the present, Mr. Willis is making his headquarters at the Mutual branch, on West Washington Street.

Mr. Willis is a former resident of this city, having lived here for 12 years prior to his engaging in the licensed film business. In New Orleans, several years ago, he opened the Dixie Film Exchange, in the old Maison Blanche Building. He next went to New York to take charge of George Kleine's exchange, and remained until it was absorbed by the General Film Company. He was then appointed manager of the Cleveland branch of the company, and resigned the position to take hold of his present duties.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Wm. H. Bell and wife arrived from Kansas City and spent several days in the city last week. Mr. Bell made his headquarters in Kansas City for some time past in the interest of the General Film Company. He recently covered Kansas, Missouri and Oklahoma and found that the exposition business was materially affected by the extremely hot weather. He states that the crops, though much damaged by the drought, will still be sufficient in quantity for the needs of the farmers.

W. R. Early has succeeded Wm. K. Hollander as manager of the New York Telegraph at 110 South Dearborn Street, this city.

The General Feature Film Company has been awarded exclusive rights for the product it controls, in Chicago territory. This gives exhibitors in this territory, the Gaumont, Solax, Great Northern, Itala, Eclectric, and the Film Releases of American Features. The last mentioned films include the leading English makes, which hitherto have been unexploited in America.

Fred Linick and Will Spillard, well known in theatrical circles in this city, have opened a booking office in the Hobbs Building, 68 West Washington Street, Chicago. They will book high class singing and vaudeville acts for moving picture theaters. Mr. Linick has had considerable experience in the show business, and recently has been manager for a number of years with Jones, Linick & Schaefer, of which syndicate his brother is a partner. Their advertisement appears elsewhere in this issue.

S. Simon, of Simon & Marks, owners of the Home Theater, 4425 Elston Avenue, was a caller at the World office last week and subscribed for that paper. Exclusive pictures are shown at the Home, Universal service being used.

ADOLPH ZUKOR TO SAIL.

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players Film Co., will sail for Europe, August 20th, on the Mauretania. Mr. Zukor will make a whirlwind tour of the continent in the interests of his company. It is believed his mission is an important one, details of which will be forthcoming shortly after his arrival on the other side.

Claude E. Buchanan

Popular Atlanta Picture Man Becomes Manager of the General Film Co.'s Commercial Branch at Atlanta.

Among the live wire picturemen who drop into the office of The Moving Picture World occasionally is Mr. Claude E. Buchanan, of Atlanta, Ga. Mr. Buchanan has been interested in the show and motion picture business for several years and it was through his connection with the enterprises of Frank T. Montgomery that he came to our attention. He admits to being a thorobred "Georgia Cracker," having been born and raised in Atlanta, but puts in an alibi to the effect that he has been in New York often enough to get on to all the curves. It is evident that Mr. Buchanan has succeeded in making a good impression upon the big men in the business in New York, for when the General Film Company contemplated establishing a commercial branch in connection with its regular Atlanta office, Mr. Buchanan was considered and eventually secured the position of manager of that department.

Claude E. Buchanan.

The commercial branch is located at 67 Walton Street, Atlanta, and will serve exhibitors in Georgia, Florida, Alabama, North and South Carolina and Tennessee. Mr. Buchanan says that the General Film Company will do everything in its power to aid exhibitors desiring this service and believes that the new plan will provide the best solution. Under the management of Mr. Buchanan it is quite probable that the new department will prove immensely popular.

Aside from his ability as a business man, Mr. Buchanan is an exceptionally entertaining and companionable gentleman. The writer has enjoyed his company and partaken of his hospitality on several occasions and entertains a high regard for him as a friend. For this and other reasons it is hoped that he will be successful in his new undertaking.

"SATAN" STILL GOING STRONG.

The Supreme Feature Film Company, of 64 East 14th Street, New York, owners of the exhibiting rights of "Satan" for New York State and City, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, report that the picture is meeting with great success in their territory and that return dates are almost as frequent as first bookings. "Satan" or the "Drama of Humanity," is one of the largest productions of the Ambrosio Company, of Turin, Italy. It is nearly 7000 feet in length and is divided into four acts. The Supreme Feature Film Co. has just started a booking agent on the road who will call upon request to the company.

RELIGION.

The Power of Prayer. Kinemacolor. (16:746.)

In Their Hour of Need. Thanhouser 23. (16:848; 922.) A sermon on "Oslerism" of the clergy. The congregation think their minister is too old to be any more use, but he proves them wrong. Good for sermons on St. John 10:11-13 & Romans 5:7-8; also on the forgiveness ot injuries.

Thus Saith the Lord. Eclair 2r., 21. (16:1180; 922.) A picture of the parable of the Wise and Foolish Virgins and the Lord's Prayer. Inaccurate and misleading as to both general structure and details.

A $100 Elopement. Edison 5. (16:620; 704.) An excellent story dealing with the 5th and 7th commandments and the dangers and evils of marrying "unadvisedly and lightly." A strong argument for the Christian view of marriage as holy and sacramental as against the commonly accepted opinions of today.

A CLEVER PUBLICITY MANAGER.

Mrs. Lillian P. Day.

During the recent convention of picture theater managers in New York quite a few of the visitors made their homes at the Imperial Hotel which was a sort of headquarters for the association officials. If there were any of the convention party who failed to make the acquaintance of Mrs. Lillian P. Day, the clever publicity manager of the hotel, the fault was quite their own because Mrs. Day made it her especial duty to look after the wants of the picturemen and their wives on that occasion and many returned to their homes with a pleasant recollection of their visit to New York made enjoyable through Mrs. Day's efforts. Through the forethought of the hotel management Mrs. Day was specially detailed to look after the ladies who accompanied the delegates and, to make her work more effective, the league officials pressed her into service as a member of the Ladies Reception Committee, in which position she labored untiringly for the comfort of the convention's guests.

Mrs. Day is a very capable woman and one who takes a deep interest in affairs. She is a member of the Womans Press Club and is a regular contributor to the Woman's Magazine and a writer of note, though she follows the vocation of press agent as a more dependable occupation.

We are writing this little appreciation for the benefit of picturemen who contemplate visiting New York and bringing their wives with them for we are certain that they will find a hearty welcome at the Imperial and Mrs. Day to help make the stay more enjoyable for the "missus."

POPULAR PLAYERS.

Earth, sea or sky have no terror for Kathlyn Williams, the beautiful star of the Selig photoplayers, whose pet ambition is to be the first successful woman hydroaeroplane operator in the world.

One look at her fearless face is a good omen of the fulfillment of her plan. "Billie" of "Unafraid," as her friends call her, has run the gamut of moving picture sensations all the way from flying machines to acting in a cage where there were untamed lions. She has never refused to risk her own safety for the sake of a good picture.

Miss Kathlyn Williams.

In the big animal film, "Lost in the Jungle," she was compelled to crouch down within a few feet of a tiger, and drop behind a protecting rock when it turned. There was some misunderstanding on one of the signals and before she could save herself, the animal leaped upon her and tore a gash in her scalp which required six stitches of the surgeon's needle. Another time in "The Girl with the Lantern," she was obliged to lie across a railroad track until a train, traveling at great speed, was within 50 feet of her. The only assurance she had of safety was the promise and quick action of the other actors who were to rescue her at that moment. If there had been a single misstep or the slightest delay Kathlyn Williams would have been crushed to death.

But what is this daring actress like, out of pictures? you ask. A perfectly unspoiled girl as natural and genuine as a child; a remarkable horse-woman and a good conversationalist.

Her hair is the real kind of golden. She laughs as if life were a great big song. And she talks as if the living of it were the best thing on earth.

At home the moving picture star, who will dare anything to make her last picture the greatest, reads and plays and cooks and eats and primps like any other girl. This winter, while she creates new roles at the Edendale studio near Los Angeles, and plays the leading part in some big, new animal pictures, she promises to learn to operate the hydroaeroplane. She has already made the preliminary plans. Chatting about the pictures, she said:

"Seeing one's self in the moving pictures is the most helpful and the most discouraging criticism an actor can have. It's the severe test of looking at yourself from the outside and at a distance.

"Mannerisms positively stare at you from a picture when they would pass unnoticed on the stage. The searching light of the picture camera seems to have revelled in your faults.

"Daylight hours, the opportunity to live at home, the wonderful variety of characters and the chance for study are the chief inducements the pictures offer to the player.

"I like being a photoplayer because I like doing the difficult, unexpected things. Maybe that's the reason I am going to be the first woman hydroaeroplanist. The strange sensation of flying through space fascinates me.

"I am not afraid. Look," she whispered as I started toward the door, "Hardly anyone knows—my life is charmed! See my talisman?"

She lifted into the light a tiny bit of ivory wonderfully carved in the shape of a fish. It is the gift of a woman who saw Kathlyn Williams in a moving picture adventure on a screen in a remote little hamlet in England.

TO SOJOURN IN NEW YORK.

Arthur Lane, manager of the Majestic and Whitney Theaters, Ann Arbor, Mich., will arrive in New York City on August 18th, to remain several weeks. Mr. Lane will combine business with pleasure, and will make his headquarters at the office of the Kinemacolor Company, Mecca Building.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

Come Right In; Don't Stop to Knock.

THE editor of this department has been on a few weeks vacation and in consequence the page has been neglected somewhat. Now that we are back in the harness we are going to try with your help to make the music department more interesting than before. Those having new ideas, worries, questions or answers—anything in fact which may be of interest to fellow musicians—please come forward with your offerings. It says "Welcome" on the door-mat and we are always glad to hear from you.

To the exhibitor who contemplates the installation of a pipe organ in his theater, I would respectfully suggest that before deciding he will give a thorough inspection to the Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra. (The manufacturers object to its being styled an organ, tho it is played the same.) Exhibitors who attended the convention in New York heard this instrument among other exhibits, of course; they could not very well help it, but amid all the confusion, bustle and many-voiced sounds, the Unit-Orchestra had little or no opportunity of demonstrating its value as applied to picture-music. To appreciate its worth, one must see and hear a practical demonstration and I found one at the Astor Theater where "Quo Vadis" is being shown. Many of the visitors attended this performance, no doubt. Those who did not, missed a treat. I saw it three times this week and enjoyed Mr. Clarence W. Dow's masterly accompaniment upon a Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra. I wish to remark in passing, that Mr. Dow is an artist, an experienced picture-musician and one of the very few I have been fortunate enough to hear, who can improvise appropriate and musical music to moving pictures.

The instrument at the Astor Theater is only one of their many styles and, as the manufacturers justly say, is destined to become very popular. So again I suggest before you decide on that pipe organ inform yourself regarding the Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra. The Rudolph Wurlitzer Co. will gladly give you details in case you are so situated that a personal examination is impossible.

Sound Effects.

Lapin's "Dramagraph" was another exhibit which attracted much attention. This is purely a "sound-effect" instrument and its inventor claims that it can be made to produce "any conceivable sound known and used in dramatic or photoplay portrayal." As that will cover theoretically every sound known to art and nature, you can see it is a pretty big proposition. At that I think they made all of them and added a few original noises during that week of July 7th. It is "some sound box" all right.

A Few Remarks From Columbus, Ohio.

"So much has been said about music for pictures in your valuable magazine that I feel as though I might add a few words of advice to picture-pianists. First of all, play the picture as it should be played, if you know how. If not, give up your position to one who does know how and save your credit. Not every pianist is qualified to play pictures. I have known the very finest performers of piano to be utterly lost on a picture as far as appropriate music for that picture goes. First of all study your picture thoroughly before you touch the piano, know just what you are playing for and play it. If you played a song for a singer you would have some feeling about that song, wouldn't you? I am sure no piano player, no matter how brilliant or what amount of knowledge of music he may have, would play 'Il Travatore' in the same rambling time and tone as he would 'Grizzly Bear.' If some of the old authors who spent the best of their lives in writing such pieces as 'Melody in F,' 'Sextette from Lucia,' 'Il Travatore,' 'Poet and Peasant,' or any of the higher class music, could hear how it is being literally butchered by the ragtime banger, they would weep with mortification if they at all recognized their composition. Now, piano player, for the sake of poor suffering humanity, please play as though you enjoyed your work and were not doing it simply because you had to, to buy a new frock or that it was more of a task than a pleasure. It is a task for an intelligent audience to sit through, probably, the very finest set of pictures, when they are poorly played. Play all the latest popular airs, of course, and, as much lively ragtime pieces as you like, but for your own sakes play them at the right time and in the right places. It is always best with a three (3) reel subject to carry the feeling of one reel straight into the next one, then play a rag or popular air at the close of the picture. I was in a picture show in my own town just a few nights ago. The picture was 'In Slavery Days,' a Southern drama. The pianist was an exception; she played All the old Southern airs, I believe, that was ever written' from 'Kentucky Home' to variation of 'Mocking Bird' and between the reels she played variations of 'Massa's in the Cole, Cole Ground,' and, to tell the truth, there was not a dry eye in the house and scarcely a breath drawn between reels, simply because that girl got her audience and she held them. One more word, pianists throw your whole life and soul into your picture. Just make yourself fit in and put feeling into your playing. I believe that the time will eventually come when the ragtime junk will be thrown out altogether, and the higher class of compositions used. Pianists should remember that no matter where the theater is located, there is bound to be a musician at some time or other visit it. And they should also remember that his or her manager is depending on them for exactly one-half of his entertainment. If the pianist is no part of the entertainment and cannot hold up his or her end of the entertainment, the sooner the music is dispensed with the better. I have played in picture shows for seven years and the best way to play for pictures is to get the 'Moving Picture World' and the moving picture stories each week and read all the stories of the picture your exchange furnishes. Then you are familiar with the thread of the picture before the show. And until pianists do acquaint themselves with the different subjects of the pictures, the managers are bound to have poor music.

"The pianist alluded to in the above is Mrs. Ethel London at the Oakwood Theater, Columbus, Ohio, and I believe her to be one of the best in our city.

"Mrs. I. B. Sneed."

New Music.

I notice Mr. J. Bodewalt Lampe, the well known American composer, is about to launch a collection of music designed for motion picture work. Mr. Lampe expects to have it on the market in a few weeks and you will doubtless see his announcement in these pages when the work is ready. It will be for piano with orchestra and can be used for any combination of instruments, and will, I am sure, be a welcome addition to the meagre selection of music designed especially for picture work which is now on the market.

A NEW CAMERAPHONE.

The Cameraphone Theaters announce the opening of a fifth moving picture theater, at 1600 Fifth Avenue, Uptown, Pittsburgh, Pa., the new house being a newly erected brick and steel building, on a corner location; and one of the best examples of modern theater building in the city. It is equipped with the finest projecting machinery, and will program none but the finest licensed films. The Cameraphone Bulletins have been enlarged to cover the new house, the opening date being August 9th.

CLEVELAND KIDS SEE "QUO VADIS."

Through the generosity of George Kleine, the various orphan aslyums of Cleveland poured their thousands of homeless waifs into the B. F. Keith Hippodrome one day last week as the guests of Mr. Kleine, to see "Quo Vadis."

OBSERVATIONS
BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

THE last month of summer has arrived and the annual speculation as to what is to happen in the world of motion pictures is prevalent. The spirit of speculation, however, is quite different from that which prevailed twelve months ago, the change being decidedly favorable to the motion picture interests. It will be remembered by those who followed the course of events a year ago that there was launched a gigantic scheme "to put the movies out of business and regain for the regular houses the patronage which the motion pictures had taken away from them." In this the dramatic and vaudeville interests combined with plenty of capital and a firm determination to fight to the bitter end. Vaudeville programs were arranged almost regardless of cost and almost lavish expenditures were made on royalties for "the great New York success," as well as to raise the standard of the casts of stock companies and plant them in localities where they would best meet the conditions for a vigorous and successful campaign against the common foe. Greater New York was selected as one of the chief battle grounds and, although they refrained from showing their hand, the regular theatrical combinations and managers were among the strongest supporters of the ordinance disturbances in the city. They were strong on the censorship question, believing that success on the part of its advocates would be one of the hardest blows the motion picture industry could sustain. Many people on the outside believed the increasing of the seating capacity of motion picture houses was the most vital question from the combination standpoint of view, but it was not. It was second in importance to its members. They knew, or at least confidently hoped, that if the censorship proposition could be carried through as "framed up," the manufacture and marketing of motion picture films would be crippled, for a time at least, to such an extent that there would be little use of the awaiting investors continuing their fight for larger houses. The restrictions sought to be imposed would have made the pictures so tame that the public would have eventually turned once again to the regular theaters for genuine amusement and entertainment.

But all the tricks and schemes failed and today we find most of the people who twelve months ago so elaborately prepared to kill the motion picture business offering their capital and other resources for its promotion. Many of them will not concede that the "movies" were too strong for them. They explain their change of front by saying they have discovered that the people see a great future for the pictures; that when elevated to the proper standard the hold the pictures have upon the people must necessarily increase; therefore the picture field offers an investment which no business man of sense can overlook. The withdrawal of the opposition by the theatrical managers and their flocking to the field of the photoplay has been quite graceful, yet hardly commendable when looked upon through the glasses of the people who have spent years of time and labor, and an enormous amount of hard earned money, in elevating the motion picture business to a plane that enabled them to withstand the unjust attacks made upon them.

But the strife has apparently passed and a cordial welcome has been extended to the new investors by the men who blazed the way for them. Now the chief speculation hinges upon the outcome of their operations. Apparently, apprehensions of evil effects is entertained only by the smaller exhibitors. To pacify them it is stated that their interests will not be jeopardized; that the new undertaking will eventually be a valuable asset to them, in that the productions contemplated will bring to the picture houses people who have held aloof from them. As one old theatrical manager put it, "It will be the same old story in new form. The cheaper stock houses lived and multiplied although the regular houses kept increasing in numbers, and so it will be with the new idea in photoplay productions in its relation to the cheaper picture houses. Each will have its own field—its own class of patronage, with an occasional interchange."

"The chief danger I see," said a man interested in one of the large film producing companies, "is the over-doing of a good thing. The film business is very much like the automobile field. As soon as some people saw the possibilities of the horseless vehicle they crowded into the manufacturing end of the game and not only stagnated the market, but put the confidence of the public to a severe test with inferior products. The proposed co-operation of theatrical managers with the photoplay producers is one of the best propositions that could be made for the interests of the latter. It promises to remove the complaint now frequently heard that many subjects are stretched into feature reels when they are really suitable for but one reel, or less. It will also be a benefit to the photoplay producer in enabling him to call a spade a spade. He will be able to use the name that belongs to a subject and not be obliged to offer it under a fictitious title to escape infringement troubles. The amusement public builds much on a name, hence the drawing power of subjects of merit is much greater under its real title. So, too, are the names of the stars of the plays who attained fame in their stage production."

Yes, there is danger of a good idea being overdone. It is feared there are too many of the cheaper class of producers who will endeavor to live on the new idea through imitation and for a time the legitimate people may have a task to sustain public confidence in the face of disappointments created by the crude efforts of the cheaper grade of producers. It will not be a question of infringement. This will be comparatively easy to handle. The evil will be the imposing upon the public of subjects based upon plays of an inferior character and launched in a manner strongly counterfeiting the legitimate undertaking.

It is here the wise exhibitor will be always on the alert and not allow himself to be drawn into an unfair competition that must eventually hurt himself more than those he competes with. He may expect that when some photoplay is doing big business he will be called upon by some shrewd promoter who will offer him something "just as good for less money." Indeed he may expect that when some legitimate production is advertised in his town he will be offered a healthy imitation for advance production. The exhibitor must always bear in mind, for his own protection, that with the steady growth of the motion picture business there has been an equally steady development of old theatrical tricks by people who do not hesitate to do anything that will get the money. By using good judgment and keeping his eyes open the smaller exhibitor will hold his own. If he tries to be smart he will lose and the legitimate managers will absorb all he had, because the public will be with them as opposed to deception.

An exhibitor was heard remark that the motion picture manufacturers were gradually deserting the people who had helped them make their fortunes. "If we had not opened the nickelodeons where would they have placed their films? Now they are working hand in hand with the large theaters and will eventually put us out of business." It is unfortunate that any exhibitor should be in this frame of mind. It is the result of unfortunate circumstances, perhaps. It may be that he has not been as energetic and ambitious as others. It indicates a standing still. One thing cannot be overlooked, that, had the places for the exhibition of motion pictures remained nickelodeons the standard of the motion picture business would not be what it is today. The development of the motion picture art has gone hand in hand with the improvement in the places of exhibition and the exhibitor who failed, or was unable, to keep up with the hand wagon cannot justify any step towards halting the progress.

KLEINE OFFERS PERFECT PUBLICITY SERVICE.

For those theaters desirous of advertising themselves through the medium of the daily papers, George Kleine offers a perfect publicity service and will supply pictures, cuts, press items and many other publicity aids for the asking. As this service has been completed and installed for the benefit of the exhibitor, the latter is invited to take advantage of its opportunity.

FOR THE CROWN.

A coming two-part production of the American Film Mfg. Co. is the second of the "Adventures of Jacques" series, replete with gorgeous material settings, costumes of the King Louis XIV period, and splendid dramatization by the foremost exponents of the pantomimic art.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Just a Caution.

JUST a few words to exhibitors who are approached by would-be photoplay writers. We had a letter only the other day from a woman who was induced to start writing animal stories because an exhibitor had told her that Selig was advertising for them. Selig is not advertising for them, and has not been in the market for this sort of thing. An advertisement did appear in this paper asking for animal scripts, but it was not inserted by the Selig Company and the company advertising is not now in the market.

The point is simply this: Photoplay writing is not the simple matter that it appears to be. Exhibitors who encourage photoplay writing in the idea that it will help their business, will find that with failure will come a reaction that will hurt more than they have previously been helped. Unless from actual knowledge you are in a position to give expert advice, don't, and then you will not be blamed for the mistakes that inevitably will be made.

Think This Over.

We take this clipping from the intelligent Photoplay Department of the Denver Times, edited by S. Barrett McCormick. Apparently the craze for quantity instead of quality hit the Colorady City, and Mr. McCormick notes with pleasure a return to reason. In a recent issue he writes:

> After several weeks in which the principal theaters have indulged in a civil, or rather uncivil war, each trying to outdo its neighbor in the length of show, the street has resumed somewhat its former inviting and prosperous countenance. The realization that three reels of the best of the photoplay world suits the average photoplay goer better than two or three hours of tiresome waiting for some particular picture has at last dawned.
> There is no amusement that has held so faithfully the attention of the public as has the picture show, but no form of entertainment will tire so quickly as the pictures, when subjects and environments foreign to the moods of the observer are thrust upon them. The three-reel show offers unquestionably the choicest selection for entertainment, and with the two- and three-reel subjects the program is best balanced.
> In the early days of the photoplay the picture program formed itself into a three-reel show.
> In those fifty minutes before the screen the observer was entertained, amused or thrilled as his taste selected, then a few moments in the open air, a relaxation and he was ready for another show, perhaps three or four in an evening. Everyone was satisfied, everyone prospered.
> It would be well to remember that the man who put the intermission into the drama did much to preserve it.

We beat Mr. McCormick to these few sapient remarks, but we are glad to see that he is of the same mind. It doesn't pay to give too much even of a good thing, and if you offer three or four reels of really good photoplay you are giving plenty.

Possibly Correct.

"An exceeding Western drama," is the way the Majestic Theater, Chico, Cal., describes a recent release, and it may be correct at that. Some Western dramas are exceeding Western, as one who knows the West can testify.

The Majestic seems to like a four-page program with three changes and a real estate advertisement. The lines regarding each subject well written and calculated to interest, and there is a conviction carried by a bottom line, which reads:

> SPECIAL NOTICE—If any of the above pictures are inferior to our usual high standard, we reserve the right of substitution, providing that the change will improve the quality of the program.

A line like that suggests to the patron and the would-be patron that the management is alert to see that only the best is shown. The house also runs the best dramatic attractions, Miss Maude Adams and Nat Goodwin, for example, and it cannot afford to carry but the best in photoplay. The same holds good for the five-cent house, as well, but the management of the Majestic runs pictures at 15 and 25 cents and offers the best. There are a lot of houses that could get the quarter right now if only they would ask for it.

Red and green seems to be a popular combination with the Majestic in poster and throwaway work, but some day when you want something odd try their combination of dark green ink on pink paper and see what you think of it. Go a little further and edge your throwaway with a twelve-point border printed right to the edge instead of with a margin. You'll be pleased with the result. To give the Majestic something in return we will suggest purple ink on a light green; not the typewritten purple, but a regular purple.

One attractive piece of advertising is a letter printed partly in twelve-point typewriter type and partly in six-point Roman, the latter being an excerpt from Louis Reeves Harrison's article on "The Vengeance of Durand," to which the letter invites attention. Since the letter is partly in straight type and so clearly an advertisement, we think that the ink signature of the manager might have been omitted, since the simulation of a real letter is not otherwise carried out.

The house advertising is uniformly good. It is restrained in style and possesses dignity. In a word it is twenty-five cent advertising. It all goes to show that if you make your house a quarter house and are in a good locality, you can get the quarter almost as easily as you can get the dime.

Two Cent Matinees.

Joseph B. Feinberg, of the Lyric Theatre, Du Bois, Pa., writes that he finds two cent matinees profitable this time of year. The cut shows a part of the attendance at the first show. Mr. Feinburg argues that two cents is better than nothing at all this time of year and almost any kiddie can raise two cents around the house even in homes where the nickels are not so plentiful. He makes it his policy to stand solid with the children and the town officials, and in addition to the two cent matinee, he has tried admitting the children two for five cents, the ice cream cone matinee and other stunts, but he finds the two cent matinee the best business bringer.

Mr. Feinberg has sound views on quantity and writes:

> Our town has a population of 15,000 and there are four houses here. The others run three and four reels for five cents. I run two reels for five cents and charge ten cents for three-reel features that are features. "The Lady of the Lake" was one of my best drawing cards. I got the Superintendent of Schools to announce the coming of the subject and also visited the schools personally and gave the principals and teachers cards of admission, stating that these would also admit two or three friends. The friends came, but most of them paid for admission. I made a special five cent rate to the high school students. I got in many persons who had never before seen motion pictures and many others who had not been in a theatre since the early days. Many of them are now regular patrons. When the people get to know that you offer quality, they are content with the price. I run a clean show with good music and do not run advertising slides.

We agree with Mr. Feinberg on the price question and he believe that in many localities managers are losing money because their prices of admission are too low. That may sound foolish to some of the old-timers who made their money in the five cent store show, and can see nothing else, but we know places that are making money with a twenty-five cent admission for five reels that would starve to death with a five cent admission and precisely the same show. Some people do not want to go to the "cheap show" and it makes no difference how good the offering may be. If there are enough of these in any one section, it will pay to cater to them.

Full of Ideas.

Philip Rich, manager of the Playhouse, Richmond, Texas, seems to be a man of ideas, as his letter will show:

> I am writing to you for the same reason that other exhibitors write and tell what they are doing, with the hope that others may benefit by it. You deserve much credit for the valuable departments "Advertising for the Exhibitor" and "Projection Department" and every other department, as I believe the motion picture industry owes half of its success to THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. I am the guy that you spoke of in the "Facts and Comments" of November 9, 1912. I am sending you pictures of my theater and want to explain my ventilating system, which is the most practical I ever heard of.

The roof has four openings, each 10 by 15 feet, the roof slightly slopes. A top goes over each opening, which moves backward and forward on a track with a one-inch by twelve-inch wheel. Two tops open to the front of the building and the others open to the rear. I haven't a single fan and it is as cool as on the outside. A stranger called my place an automatic airdrome; perfectly waterproof when closed and it takes me about two minutes to close all four of them with no strain at all. How do you like the literature, especially the booklet? It cost me about 2½ cents for the cover, 5 cents for a back number magazine, of which I get 5 and 6 stories. I intend to sell the last page to merchants, then it will be still cheaper. I have lots of advertising schemes; my town has only twelve hundred population, more than half colored, and I have to work hard to get them all out to my show, the only one, of course, but a nice one. I started last summer in an airdrome; have made good. I put the building up myself, leasing the lot for 10 years at $5 per month. My place is the most popular in town. The school got my house for their exercises; the churches put on shows occasionally for their benefit. I give away postcards of players too. I number each one, and ten of the numbers get a free pass next night, announcing "bring your card and see if the number on your card corresponds with a number on the window." I am selling tickets good for 25 performances for $2.00. They use them up right quick.

The Ventilating System.

The ventilating system is not new as applied to dramatic theaters, but we have not seen it advertised in photoplay theaters before. Twenty-five years ago the late Pat Harris boomed his sliding roof on the Bijou Theater in Washington, and there were others.

The scheme is very simple. The dome of the playhouse is divided into four wells, each covered by a skylight running on wheels on a groove track. They are operated by cable and pulley, sliding one way by gravity. The better way is to pull them off and let them slide back, so that the house may be closed quickly in case of a sudden shower. The use of two or more wells in place of a single one gives a draught that keeps the air moving and always fresh. Where only one well is used the draught is either down or up, but with two wells the air will enter one and leave by the other. Wherever the house is directly roofed this will form the ideal ventilating system, though it is well to have fans in case the house has to be closed on account of rain during a performance. An awning that will cover a wide margin beyond the wells will enable the roof to be kept open even during a rain, if there is not too much wind. In Texas heating problems seldom bother, but the adaptation of this idea will give any northern house a summer airdrome, though it will increase the heating cost in winter if the shafts are not tightly closed.

Makes His Own Magazine.

The magazine to which Mr. Rich alludes is a special cover for a few pages of The Motion Picture Story Magazine, about eight pages being bound up in a special cover with wire staples. Care is used to get pages that carry stories complete, and now and then some pages must be wasted where a story stops on a right hand page and another commences on the left hand page following. If Mr. Rich were on the Mutual program he could get a current weekly issue for five cents.

Another advertising slip shows the cut of a watch and this text:

> This Beautiful Watch will be given away on April 26th to the Boy who collects the most Playhouse coupons.
> HOW TO GET THE COUPONS
> We give a Coupon with every ticket you buy. Get your father, mother, neighbors and friends to come to the PLAYHOUSE, so that they can give you the Coupons which we give them with every ticket they buy. When you have collected 50 coupons, bring them to our ticket window, and we will give you a receipt for them. Do this every time you get 50 Coupons. Keep the receipts, as they will count as 50 Coupons.
> On April 26th make a package of the Receipts and Coupons and bring them to the Playhouse before 6 p. m. See that your full name and address is on the package. Each package will be counted, and the boy holding the highest number will be the winner of the Beautiful Watch.
> The name of the winner will be given out at 8 p. m. on April 26th at the Playhouse.
> Bring you friends and come to the Playhouse to see the Beautiful Watch.

There is nothing in this scheme contrary to the federal laws on lotteries, which is a valuable feature. Drawings or any form of chance violate these laws and you can never tell when someone with a badge will come along.

Coupon Tickets.

The twenty-five admission ticket would be better if more pretentions. There are lines for the date and name and the statement that the ticket is good for twenty-five performances. There are 25 capital O, top and bottom. That is all. It doesn't look like a regular ticket, and the next lot would be bettered if more carefully done with the signature of the manager and a little more reading matter. It is good for the stated number of admissions, but somehow it does not impress one as a regular ticket. The so-called "safety" paper, such as is used for railroad tickets would be a good stock, a reproduction in line of Mr. Rich's signature would help, but something should be done to make the ticket look more impressive. The local printer has been laying down on his job. Some of the card catalogue stock we use in our office records is much more pretentious than this, and we set all of the type in half an hour, at that. The admissions are what count, and yet the purchaser likes to have a card that looks like a regular ticket to show what he has bought.

Mr. Rich has the right idea in placing his house at the disposal of the schools and churches. Get them coming to the house even if they will not come to see your show and in time they will come to see the show, too, because they have come to know the house.

We are glad to see that Mr. Rich does not crowd his house with posters. Six one-sheet frames seem to be his limit, as it should be.

Gets the Farmers.

Lew F. Cullins, of the Casino, The Dallas, Oregon, writes that since he made it very clear to his exchange that he would take no advertising films, he has not been bothered with them. It's the same way everywhere. If you let the exchange run you it will do as it pleases, but if you hold out for your rights you can get them—elsewhere if not at the exchange you deal with.

Mr. Cullins sends a picture of his house dressed up for the Fourth of July, the decorative effect being added to by his daughter and in a lesser degree by himself and his son. It's a nice looking house and Mr. Cullins prides himself that he runs it like a "regular theater," even if he is in a small town.

Mr. Cullins is strong for the Farmer's Matinee scheme and sends one of the tickets he uses, with the name of the business house added, instead of being put on with a rubber stamp. The appearance of the ticket is so vastly better that it is worth the small additional cost. His ticket is one inch by four and a quarter and carries the name of the business firm where the coupon would be on a reserved seat ticket. We presume that they are printed in sheets, with one ticket for each of the subscribers and then cut apart. He writes:

> I do not know who originated the scheme, but it's great. I first got the idea from the columns of your paper. I got 33 business houses at from $1 to $1.50 per week, according to the number of tickets they took, and made a contract for ten weeks. It was a big winner for all concerned. Lots of those who came just because it was free, got the habit.

That's what they all say. We know of nothing that has been so uniformly successful in all parts of the country. Have you tried it? You do not have to own a small town house. It will do as well in the suburban districts of the cities.

Booms Film With Film.

Harry G. Waldron sends two cards, each carrying four frames of positive film and the advertisement of his house or his road show. Nothing attracts more attention from the curious than a strip of film and every one of these cards will be peserved, if not by the recipient at least by someone interested in pictures or capable of being interested. He explains that the film costs $2.50 per thousand feet in good condition. It is three-year-old stuff, but clean and clear. The text runs:

This is a Piece of
To see the very best moving pictures shown on the only
MIRROR SCREEN
in North Dakota.
Go To The
ELECTRIC THEATER

The film is fastened above the top line with a staple.

Can You Say It?

A recent folder from the U-Kum Theater, Toronto, carries an underline that runs: "You will find our theater delightfully clean and cool." Can you say that about your house and say it honestly? If you cannot, why can't you—and why don't you get yourself where you can?

The Cameraphone Editor.

We said in a recent issue that we would be glad to give credit to the editor of the Cameraphone bulletins, Pittsburgh, if we only knew who he was. The publishers advise us that they are edited by James Waldo Fawcett, of the Pittsburgh Dispatch, whereat we solemnly shake hands with Mr. Fawcett and invite him to have something in a glass with us next time he comes to New York. He is doing good work for the business at large as well as for the houses he represents.

Those Two Reel Stories.

NINE-TENTHS of the real demand to-day is for two-reel photoplay stories. This does not mean that nine out of ten future releases will be in two or more parts, but that most companies have suddenly wakened to the fact that the two-part story is the one in greatest demand. There is an ample supply of good one-reel stories, but not enough good two-reel stories submitted to meet the demand of the moment. With this issue we begin the publication of a series of articles on the two part story, presenting as the first contribution an article by Phil Lang, the editor of the Kalem Company, accompanied by the actual working script of their two-reel story, "The Skeleton in the Closet," released August 13, in two parts. Perhaps you can induce your local manager to get this reel and run it. It will help you in your study of the script.

Mr. Lang's article, while short, covers the ground fully. It points out the added possibilities of the greater space at command and shows how an unpromising single-reel story may be made into a capital double reel, provided that there is two thousand feet of story. And in closing we would caution the reader against seeking to get into personal correspondence with Mr. Lang or the others who will contribute. Mr. Lang is a very busy man and cannot take the time to supplement this article with personal instruction. If you wish to ask any questions, ask of this department. Mr. Lang cannot and will not take the time to reply. It is a part of our duty to do so.

THE TWO-PART PHOTOPLAY.

By Phil Lang,

Editor of the Kalem Company.

In the past the production of a multiple-reel photoplay was due to unusual circumstances and the manufacturers were not inclined to look to outside sources for such subjects. Now that the two-part feature is to be found in the list of nearly every leading producer's weekly releases, a pleasant and profitable field is opened for the capable scenario writer.

The Kalem Company has several organizations in different parts of the country, giving their entire attention to the production of two-part plays and scenarios suitable for their purposes are gladly considered.

We find the best simile for what a two-part photoplay should be in the crescendo effect in music. The story must constantly develop in interest until the finale of the first reel makes the spectator impatient to see what the second reel will bring forth. Naturally the first part is largely introductory, but the development of the interest should begin in the first one thousand feet and there should be at least one gripping situation. The second part must take up the development of the strong situation at the finale of the first part and continue with even greater dramatic force to the final climax. This necessarily means that the "big punch" must be in the second part and this powerful episode—whatever it may be—is intensified by that which has preceded it.

We know too well what when a sub-plot is introduced in a photoplay—particularly in a one-reel subject—the interest is maintained with difficulty and the intensity of the central theme is lost. It does very well on the stage for the butler and the maid to have their little scene while the principals are changing wardrobe, but the interest in the photoplay must be centered on a very few characters.

In the two-part play we can come nearer to the sub-plot, but, strictly speaking, it should be religiously avoided. The point we wish to make is that a clever photoplaywright can introduce more characters in a two-part story and show something of their individualities, but only when every incident has a direct bearing upon the central theme.

There must be a logical reason for making a play in two parts. When you have mapped out your plot you should ask yourself: "Can this same story be told effectively in one reel?" If you find that it can, naturally you do not have a two-part play.

If your two-part story is dependent upon the big incident which is to occur in the second reel and the intense manner in which you will lead up to it, you should figure on a preceding situation of importance toward the close of the first reel in order that this first reel may not be altogether introductory.

Should the story deal with two periods, it goes without saying that the first part should end with the final incidents of the first era, and the second part should open up with the episodes which introduce the later period.

We have a more complete story in two parts. We can round out our play and can introduce incidents which would oftentimes help a one-reel play, but which cannot be used because of the limited length. Kalem's two-part release, "The Skeleton in the Closet," is a case in point and the history of this production will no doubt be of interest as it was submitted as a one-reel play. The original story concerned a girl who was obliged to seek a new home because of an unpleasant environment. In that form it required an introduction consisting of a few brief episodes which were scarcely in keeping with the Kalem policy. By rewriting the play we were able to show that the incidents which formed the skeleton in the closet were most unusual. It was also possible to introduce a thrilling battle on the plains and a situation new to photoplays. The two-part scenario in its entirety is published below.

There seems to be a difference of opinion regarding the manner in which a two part scenario should be divided—whether the scenes should be numbered consecutively or whether each reel should be numbered individually. For Kalem production the script in which each reel is numbered separately is preferred as the directors usually conform to one system.

It is customary just before taking a scene for the cameraman's assistant to hold up the scene number and this is photographed. In handling the film the developers know how to make their reports concerning any photographic deficiencies and the assemblers use the scene numbers as a guide. For the two-reel plays the Kalem operators photograph the scene numbers from slates marked "Reel One" and "Reel Two." We find that numbering each part separately works out better all around. But we certainly would not refuse a good play if the scenes happened to be numbered consecutively. "The play's the thing."

Note.—It is not practicable to actually reproduce this script in fac-simile, nor is it necessary. It should be noted that the synopsis and the two inserts are single spaced, all the rest being double spaced. The scene numbers and sub-titles are brought out flush with the left-hand margin instead of being indented. Sub-titles are in capitals. The matter set in italics in the text is in lower case in the copy with an underline, which serves to throw into prominence the scene descriptions.

"THE SKELETON IN THE CLOSET."

A Western Drama in Two Parts.

Characters.

DAN, the Deputy Sheriff.
SHERIFF MORTON.
KITTY HAWKINS, the young school teacher.
HAWKINS, Kitty's father.
MASON, cattle thief and bad man.
Mason's companion.
Citizen at Stone Gulch.
Several Western characters.
A Western minister.
Settlers, Indians, School Children.

SYNOPSIS—PART ONE.

Kitty Hawkins, a young school teacher, returns to her father's ranch at the end of the term and is distressed to find that he is implicated with cattle thieves. Fearing the girl will thwart his operations, he forces her to accompany him on several expeditions. Mason, a rustler, annoys her by his attentions. Kitty runs away and joins a party of pioneers. The little band is attacked by Indians, and Kitty, the sole survivor, is found by Dan, the deputy sheriff, who takes her to the humble home which he shares with his superior. When she gains strength and would go her way, Dan and the sheriff prevail upon her to remain and keep house for them. The inevitable happens. Both men fall in love with Kitty and the sheriff wins out. Dan feels he must seek a new home and quietly slips away while the sheriff and Kitty visit the minister.

SYNOPSIS—PART TWO.

Mason has words with Hawkins and leaves. He comes to the village where Kitty resides and learns of her marriage. By threatening to tell the sheriff of her antecedents—that she is a cattle thief's daughter—he extorts money from her. Dan, who has lost none of his regard for Kitty, overhears Mason make a slighting remark and roundly thrashes him. He goes to Kitty for an explanation and she confides in him. The sheriff enters and misconstrues their quiet conference. Dan will offer no explanation and incurs the ill-will of his old friend. He comes back to Mason and gives him one hour to get out of town. The sheriff is paid a reward and Mason tries to steal it during the official's absence. Dan, returning to see if Mason has left town, hears Kitty's scream. He fires through the window and the rogue pays the penalty. Dan leaves a note on the window, stating that he has taken the Elkhorn Trail, but when the sheriff returns he concludes that justice has been done and comes to a realization of his former deputy's sterling qualities.

Sub-title: THE END OF THE SCHOOL TERM.

Scene 1. Exterior of country school house.

Kitty, wearing hat and carrying grip, comes out of school house, surrounded by school children. She bids them all good-bye with affection. Kisses some of the little girls. Children show their fondness for her. One child points down the road: "Here comes the stage coach!" Kitty picks up her grip. Stage drives in. Kitty enters coach and rides away, while children wave after her.

Scene 2. Exterior. Road through mountains.

Flash of stage coach on its journey.

Sub-title: KITTY ARRIVES HOME.

Stage drives up and Kitty alights. Stage drives on. Hawkins, Kitty's father, comes out to meet her. Greetings. Hawkins places his arm about Kitty and conducts her into the house. She pauses at door to look about at old familiar sights. They enter. Mason (heavy) and companion enter scene. These two men are cattle thieves and associated with Hawkins. They fear Kitty's presence will hinder their operations. They look at one another with dissatisfaction.

Sub-title: HAWKINS, KITTY'S FATHER, IS IN LEAGUE WITH CATTLE RUSTLERS.

Scene 4. Near Scene 3. Exterior of ranch-house.

Hawkins conferring with Mason and his companion. Kitty appears in door, unseen, and is horrified at what she overhears. Mason draws his watch and makes an appointment. The two men shake hands with Hawkins and leave. Kitty comes down and demands an explanation of Hawkins. He curtly tells her it is none of her business. He makes it plain that he will not be hindered, but is not rough with Kitty. Kitty continues to protest and it is seen that Hawkins is uneasy. He orders her to enter the house and follows.

Sub-title: THE NEXT DAY. FEARING THAT KITTY WILL THWART HIS PURPOSES, HAWKINS MAKES HER ACCOMPANY HIM.

Scene 5. Near ranch-house.

Hawkins on horseback is starting out to meet his companions. Kitty rides up and again entreats with him. Hawkins tells her she will have to go along. She protests. He sternly commands her and they ride away together.

Scene 6. Exterior location.

Mason and companion waiting on horseback. Hawkins and Kitty ride up. Two men surprised. Hawkins quietly explains that he wants to keep an eye on Kitty. They all ride on.

Scene 7. Exterior location.

A large number of cattle seen grazing in background. Party of former scenes rides into foreground. Mason points to cattle. All ride toward the herd.

Scene 8. Exterior location. Near Scene 7.

The three men and Kitty ride up. The theft of the cattle. Kitty watches with great uneasiness.

Sub-title: SETTLERS SEEKING A LOCATION.

Scene 9. Rough Roadway.

A single prairie schooner rides along. At the side of the wagon is man on horseback, who looks about for a possible location. He gives a sign to the driver and they continue their journey.

Scene 10. Before the ranch-house as in former scenes.

Kitty and the party return with the stolen cattle. Kitty greatly disturbed. Hawkins and thief lead cattle out of scene while Mason comes up to Kitty and begins to make love to her. She recoils in disgust.

Sub-title: "A THIEF'S DAUGHTER IS NONE TOO GOOD FOR ME."

Mason makes the above remark to Kitty. She slaps him on the cheek. He draws back in amazement while Kitty begins to denounce him. Hawkins comes into the scene and Mason tells him what has taken place. Hawkins clenches his fists, but dares not be too severe with his daughter and leads Mason away.

Sub-title: KITTY ESCAPES FROM HER UNHAPPY ENVIRONMENT.

Scene 11. Exterior of ranch house.

Kitty comes out quietly with little bundle in her hands. She looks sadly about and steals away.

Scene 12. Exterior location.

Short flash of Kitty passing across scene.

Scene 13. Rough roadway.

The party of settlers riding along. Kitty comes into the scene and driver makes inquiry. Kitty asks if she may join expedition and tells her unhappy story. One of the women of the party comes to her side and comforts her. She suggests to the men that they take Kitty. All agreeable. Kitty enters wagon and rides off with the party.

Sub-title: THE NEXT DAY.

Scene 14. Rough exterior location.

A small party of Indians rides along. Leader sights something and tells his companions. They ride away.

Scene 15. Distant view of roadway.

Prairie schooner driving along. Indians fall upon party. They fight.

Scene 16. Roadway.

Close-up view of the fight between Indians and settlers. Indians having the best of it.

Sub-title: DAN, THE SHERIFF'S DEPUTY, FINDS THE SOLE SURVIVOR.

Scene 17. Roadway. Same as 16.

The prairie schooner is a mass of smouldering wreckage. The bodies of the dead should be hidden as much as possible to prevent a revolting spectacle. Body of Kitty in the foreground. Dan, the deputy sheriff, rides up. Is horrified at sight. Looks from one to another of the victims and shakes his head as he apparently finds no sign of life. Then he comes to Kitty. Raises her up. She regains consciousness, but is very weak. He puts her on his horse, mounts behind her and drives off.

Scene 18. Exterior of ranch house as in former scenes.

Hawkins seen anxiously scanning the surrounding country, hoping that Kitty will return. He is sad at heart. Mason saunters in and inquires about her. Hawkins is apparently brought to a realization of the circumstances which drove Kitty from home and is not cordial to Mason, who sneers and saunters away. Hawkins sinks his head in his hands.

Scene 19. Exterior of sheriff's office. A rough, modest dwelling.

Sheriff seated. Dan rides up with Kitty. Sheriff, in surprise, helps Kitty to alight. Dan tells of the discovery. They assist Kitty into the house.

Scene 20. Interior of sheriff's living room. Set shows a back window.

Sheriff and Dan enter with Kitty and endeavor to make her comfortable.

Sub-title: LATER, DAN AND THE SHERIFF INDUCE KITTY TO REMAIN AND KEEP HOUSE FOR THEM.

Scene 21. Same as 20. Sheriff's living room.

Kitty, now fully recovered, is preparing to leave. Dan and the sheriff look at her with admiration and ask her to stay and keep house for them. Kitty thinks a moment and cheerfully agrees. Dan asks her to take a walk. The sheriff looks crestfallen. Dan and Kitty walk out of scene.

Scene 22. Exterior of sheriff's.

Dan's affection for Kitty is apparent from the tender way in which he holds her arm as they come out of the house together. She laughs and disengages her arm. A man comes up and calls Dan away. Dan is disappointed, but accompanies the man. The sheriff is seen at the door and is apparently pleased at the opportunity to be alone with Kitty. They walk away slowly in the opposite direction from that taken by Dan.

Scene 23. Near Hawkins' Ranch House.

Hawkins examining a horse's hoof. Mason saunters in and asks about Kitty. Hawkins becomes furious and drives him away, saying he will make it hot for the thief if he comes around again. Mason exits.

Inquiries

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

J. F.—If you mean that you sent your script to the New York offices of the New York Motion Picture Company, it is not unlikely that it is lost. If it is, you have no redress. The production headquarters of the company are in Los Angeles, and there is no arrangement made in New York for the receipt of manuscript. If you sent the script to Los Angeles, do not worry because it has been gone two weeks. Wait a couple of months. We've had a script with Vitagraph since May 8th, and we are not worried yet. Send for a list of addresses and then send your scripts to the proper office.

B. E. H.—The mirror screen is a plate glass mirror with the front, or clear glass, frosted to prevent too strong a reflection. If you put in a plain mirror you will get a reflection of the house as well as the picture. You will find it cheaper in the long run to buy a screen. Experimentation will cost you a lot more and you will not have a screen in the end. It is the frosting of the surface exactly right that gives the effect.

I. W.—It was Miss Mae Marsh in "The Little Tease." We do not reply to questions as to marriage relations or other purely personal affairs of the players. Miss Marsh is hereby informed of your request that she shun the dramatic stage in order that she may stay in pictures.

W. H. J.—We do not suppose that the use of abbreviations instead of full names in scripts will make much difference, but why not use names so short that they do not need abbreviation? Call your hero Ned or Bill instead of Asmodeous Cincinnatus Jones, and you won't have to worry about abbreviation. It is lots simpler and the plan generally followed.

N. L. P.—You can use visions if you want to, but it is not advisable. The time cost is what counts, the making of the double exposure and all that. We don't think that you really need four visions. If you will study a few moments you'll probably find a way out. You probably have more than fifteen scenes in that story. If you have not, don't write it.

H. A.—Keystone seems to be paying about $15 each for synopses. We know of no other company asking for synopses only.

RUBENA.—We missed you last week. Sydney Rankin Drew is the son of Sydney Drew, who married Miss Gladys Rankin, which accounts for the middle name. We do not know that Miss Walker has a sister with Vitagraph. You're a good little guesser on ages. There is no Edison company in California. It returned some weeks ago. Western Essanays are not cast. Miss Gery is with Pathe. We have no opinion to express on the acting of the various players. The Answer Man réformed and stopped being a critic four years ago.

MADAME X.—We do not reply to questions such as yours, as we have explained before.

R. A. D.—You need more than one sale to make a reputation. One sale may be an accident. Five is a habit. The cut-back is very fully treated in the new Technique. It is the repeated return to a scene with alternate scenes of related action. Sometimes it is merely two long scenes cut up and alternately joined.

RICHARD ROE—Sorry we are shy that Imp cast. Cines and Eclipse one part stories have been dropped in favor of their two-reel subjects. The first Biograph was shown in 1896, at what is now the New York Theater, but then the Olympia. On the early program the feature was the late President McKinley at his home in Canton. Other early headliners were the Empire State Express, the Haverstraw tunnel, on the Hudson; and the Atlantic City Fire Department, where one of the steamers ran into the camera. We cannot give the exact date of showing, but it was along in July or August, 1896.

M. M.—Evidently the script was inspected by someone in authority, but we have no record that production has been recommended. You can exceed 250 words in the synopsis of a two part story if you want to, but it is rarely necessary. You do not have to tell all of the points of the story, but merely the big points. To write merely to see the matter screened and with no thought of the pay seems to be Art. We know how you feel about it. Surely your are invited to come again and as often as you please. You've made a hit with the Answers Man by not asking "Are they married?"

D. D.—We do not know that first Broncho answer. Bill Weston was Pedro in "The Iconoclast." Most of your other questions have been replied to too recently to require repetition, and you ask a lot too many, anyhow. Ask about three each time and look back a couple of weeks to see if they have not already been answered.

17 Madison Avenue - New York City

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

San Francisco.

SAN FRANCISCO will remain in my memory as one great big merry-go-round, with a great big glad hand sticking out of every seat. Brother Woods—may his shadow never grow less—met us at the depot and the Dale Hotel, on the Rialto, quickly became our temporary Happy Home. This happened about 9 A. M. At 11 A. M. appeared Brother De Latimer, of the San Francisco M. P. Operators Union, with his big, seven-passenger touring car—yes, he's a mere operator, thank you—the interior of which quickly absorbed Brother Woods and your Humble Servant. Brother P. J. Ashcraft, also of the M. P. O. Union, was picked up and then, after a spin through the business section and a pause at the Progress Theatre in Fillmore Street, where Brother De Latimer is in charge of projection, Miss Woods, daughter of Brother Woods, and Mrs. De Latimer were added to the joy-ride party. Well, they certainly did show me as much of 'Frisco as any one man ever saw in one day, including the Exposition Site, Cliff House, the famous Shore Drive and beautiful Golden Gate Park, winding up with a trip through Chinatown and "Barbary Coast," and a dinner at one of the famed Italian restaurants. And, by the way, it is a cold fact that several members of the 'Frisco Operators Union own real automobiles (Brother Woods has a new six-cylinder car ordered), and very many indeed own motor cycles. I am told that the street in front of the Union headquarters on meeting night resembles the headquarters of a motor cycle club.

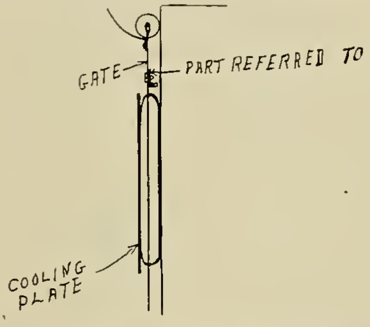
After our ride and dinner I went to the Market Street Theater and met Mr. Getz, of Hallahan & Getz, owners of the Market Street Theater and the Haight Street Theater, both high class, strictly moving picture houses, using nothing but first run films and paying a little more than $30,000 per year for film service for the two theatres. Mr. Getz was much put out by the fact that I could only remain in the city one day, and that day, Sunday, the heaviest of the week. He wanted to take us out for a "real" time. Great, suffering Jerusalem, man! If any more streuuous "real" times were sprung on us than that set forth by the operators, we would have taken to the high timber and would be running yet.

Well, there is a story of much interest and some length in connection with the Market Street Theater. Its owners are wealthy. Its chief operator (Bro. Woods) has a charming daughter, and a six-cylinder automobile ordered. The assistant operator owns 160 acres of fine fruit land. Its door keeper owns four or five flat buildings and its janitor, poor poverty-stricken wretch, has to be content with a $7,000 flat building, recently purchased. Bear in mind that the foregoing is not a joke, but just plain fact. Even the ticket seller must be wealthy, for I saw money stacked up all around her.

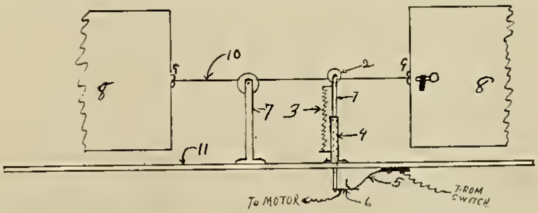
What is the answer to all this, do you ask? Please excuse me from answering. I don't know; it seems to be in the air. What I saw in 'Frisco has given my ideas concerning New York City as the place to make coin, one rather severe jolt. After Brother De Latimer ran his show that night, Brother Woods and I saw him and his wife off on an auto trip of 90 miles, almost to Sacramento, by the light of the moon. Chew on that awhile, you eastern operators!

But to return to the Market Street Theater. Its front is exceedingly neat and attractive by day, and by night is a fountain of light. The light scheme is harmonious, colors blending above and a literal blaze of white light in the snow-white lobby below. The house is spacious and neatly decorated. It has a large balcony and is in every way well appointed, but everything else is made as it should be made, secondary to the main thing—the picture on the screen. It is there the Market Street Theatre shines, and it is there that all 'Frisco excels. They pay the price for real operators and they get them. I remarked to Manager Eugene H. Roth, of the Portola Theater, "you have brains in the operating rooms of 'Frisco." "Yes," was his reply, "and the buying of those brains was the best money we, the managers, ever spent." But to again return to the Market Street house. I visited the operating room, and let me say right now that, regardless of any friendship existing between Woods and I, I have never, in all my experience, seen an operating room in which appeared so many evidences of thought, study and the use of brains as I saw there. In many San Francisco operating rooms I saw ample evidence that the man in charge was a real operator and a man of genuine ability, but here I found even more than this. The appearance of the room, the manner in which Woods moved about attending to his duties, proclaimed him to be a master of his profession. And now let me try to set forth what I saw:

In the first place, nearly all San Francisco projectors have a metal chute extending from the condenser mount to the aperture. Some of these are hinged to the condenser mount and swing up and back, while some are attached to the machine gate and are hinged in the middle, the back half swinging up. All are square in shape. In the side and top, near the gate, is set either a green glass or two pieces of mica with green gelatine between. This chute not only protects the operator's eyes from the glare of the spot and the light ray, but absolutely prevents the film from getting into the light ray, should it bunch up below. But Brother Woods has gone a step further; he has two Powers Six A machines and he has placed a guard of perforated metal from the lower front edge of the condenser mount to the bottom of the lamphouse, in bow shape, so that in case the film climbs the lower sprocket, it just runs out along the top of the table and quietly drops down under the lamphouse to the floor. Brother Woods has the lower film shield removed. He argues thusly: The law requires the entire enclosure of the film; all right! I prefer to entirely enclose the light, which amounts to precisely the same thing in effect, and allows me to watch my film. By this plan the film cannot possibly get into the light, or touch anything hot. It is the plan of common sense. It shows that Brother Woods does what too few men do, viz., reasons from cause to effect. In this room I noticed a small white placard just above, and attached to the top front edge of the upper magazine of each machine, and a round white spot on the wall just to the left of each observation port. On the former appeared an image of the arc, emanating from a small lens just over a pin-hole in the lamphouse wall right down close to the upper edge of the condenser mount; this gave the operator a constant, absolutely accurate view of the side-line of his carbons. On the round spot beside the observation port appeared a side view of the crater and arc, projected by a small, compact device attached to the lamphouse door. This device will be illustrated later on. This brings the arc under the eye of the operator constantly, without even the effort of turning the head. It is the best arrangement I have ever seen. On the inner side of the gate, just above the tension shoes, Brother Woods has attached a flat strip of metal bent thus:



This, Woods says, acts as a positive fire stop. The strip should extend out almost to the aperture plate. I did not see it tested, but it sounds very reasonable. I believe it has real value. In this room, as well as in several other 'Frisco operating rooms, I saw a film storage tank which spells just plain common sense. It is so ridiculously simple that it is a wonder you and I and everyone else did not think of it years ago. Against the wall is an inclined metal chute, a little thicker than the thickness of a reel and a little higher than the diameter of a reel. At either end is a spring door, and about fifteen inches from the lower end is a spring stop. The operator puts his reels into the upper end of this chute, which must be long enough to hold a whole show, in the order in which they are to be used. The first reel rolls gently down against the stop, the next one against the first one, and so on, until all are inside the chute. When the operator wants a reel he pulls the stop; the first reel rolls down against the door at the end, which brings the second reel against the stop. He now removes the first reel, places it on the machine, rewinds the one just used and places it in the upper end of the chute, whence it travels downward until it, in its turn, again rests against the stop, ready to be again projected. By this plan the reels are completely enclosed and it is practically impossible to get the show mixed, since each reel pops out of the chute in its turn, and cannot possibly come out any other way. I roasted the boys for not sending in a description of this device for publication and their reply was that it was so simple and so obvious that they thought it would sound like bragging to set it forth—Piffle and likewise fudge, gentlemen! See to it you do not again offend.



And now, another thing: Many rather complicated schemes for automatically cutting the current off the rewinder motor when rewinding is done, or the film breaks, have been submitted to the editor. In every operating room I visited in 'Frisco a simple device for this purpose was in use. Each was a little different from the others, but all were essentially the same. Each consisted of an upright rod surmounted by an idler similar to a sprocket idler. This idler rests on the film when it is stretched between the reels (these must be tension on the back reel) and in this position is raised so that it pulls the motor switch shut, or else closes any one of half a dozen forms of contact. If the film breaks, or when rewinding is complete, the rod and roller drop down and break the contact, thus stopping the motor.

Referring to the cut, 10 is the film, and 8-8 the magazines. 7 is a standard and roller to support the film; ii is the rewinder table; 9-9 are the magazine fire-traps; 1 is a standard, bearing a roller and extending through hollow standard 4. It carries, on its lower end, contact (brass or steel) 6, to which is attached motor wire. This contact makes contact with spring 5. to which motor circuit wire is also attached, so that when roller at top of standard 1 drops, the circuit is broken by the parting of the two contacts. 6 must be insulated from the standard to which it is attached, of course.

And another thing: Brother Woods is using a unique machine shutter. on which he has expended much time and thought. It consists of thick celluloid, doubled, with certain proportions of certain colors between. He claims to get a decided stereoscopic effect and that the blacks are given a rich, velvety tone and that the other shades have added value. I would not care to pass on these claims without first having viewed the same film run, first with an ordinary shutter and then with Brother Wood's invention. Certainly he had a beautiful picture and I believe there really is something, perhaps a lot, in his shutter. But he frankly admits it is not a commercial shutter, since the colors to use, as well as their proportions, depend on the house lights, decorations, etc., in each individual case. Another scheme Woods uses is as follows: He uses exclusively first run films, and we all know that first run emulsion sticks more or less, usually more, to the tension shoes or springs. To overcome this Woods removes the large idler roller just back of the top sprocket of his Powers Six, substituting therefore a special roller made as follows: He takes one of the large rollers and turns out its center, clear out to the side flanges, until it is merely a spool about ¼-inches in diameter, with thin side flanges full size. In each of these side flanges he drills two holes and inserts dowel pins about ½-inch long. He then gets an ordinary shotgun cartridge, of a size so that the roller flange would just fit into it. This he cuts down to probably ½ inch in depth. He then fills a squirt-can with melted parafine and fills the mould to its top with parafine. Thus he has a roller hub of paraffine, which he trims down to the proper width and diameter, and places on the roller spindle, with a thin washer at the end, and clamps it just tight enough so it will only turn when the film rubs it tolerably hard. It lubricates the emulsion sufficiently so that the trouble is very largely, though not always entirely, overcome. And still another thing I believe to be of a large value. Wood was annoyed by condensers breaking. He reasoned it out that this could be stopped. The lens doesn't ordinarily break when it is hottest, he argued. It cracks in cooling. This is due to the fact that the thin outer edge cools more rapidly than the thick center. Problem: to equalize the contraction. His solution was simple. He had made, for the rear lens, a brass holder about ⅜ inch thick, with a shallow ring turned out to receive the lens. To this he fastens, with screws, a brass plate chambered to fit the bevel of the lens loosely. The theory is that this thick, heavy metal holder gets very hot and retains the heat, thus equalizing the cooling of the thin edge of the lens and its thick center. In other words, since he cannot cool the center of the lens quickly, he keeps the thin edge hot and—there you are. It works, of course. And in these things you see the difference of the high-salary man who thinks, and the low-salary man who doesn't.

The 'Frisco Union has plenty of members who are capable of building a projector in its entirety, and making a good job of it, too. You don't have to take their screw drivers away from them for fear they will ruin the machine. They have a full kit of tools and know how to use them. As an organization, they believe in high salaries, secured, not only as a matter of justice, but also on the merit of their work, and the screens of 'Frisco give ample proof of the correctness of their positions. I know I have said much in praise of the 'Frisco boys but, gentlemen, it is even more than deserved. I would rather add to it, than take away. Among the theaters visited during the evening were: The Pastime, Market Street; H. K. Herzog, manager; Brother Howell, operator. The Portola, Market Street; E. H. Roth, manager; W. E. White, operator. The Silver Palace, Market Street; Charles Stillwell, manager; Frank Pedlar, operator. The V-Odeon and Unique, Market Street; Joseph Huff, manager. The Panama, Market Street; Mr. Smith, manager; Fred Rhea, operator. The Quality, Fillmore Street; Jack Elbert, operator. The Progress, Fillmore Street; Brother De Latimer, operator. Haight Street Theater, C. E. Jones, operator, and the Sutter Theater, Sutter Street; R. M. Combs, operator.

At 11 P. M. there was a foregathering of congenial operator souls in a thirst emporium in Turk Street, and there we remained until the wee sma' hours. Plans were laid at 3 A. M. to get an auto and go out to the Shore Drive, the idea being, as I afterward discovered, to kidnap the editor and compel him to remain another day, but, much as I enjoyed the occasion, I was due to leave at 8 A. M., so I vetoed any shore drives and thus escaped. It is a matter of sincere regret to me that I was unable to remain in San Francisco longer, and have the very real pleasure of meeting every one of the boys personally. As it is, my brief stay was delightful, and I hope some day to again experience the hospitality of the men of the City of the Golden Gate.

A New Theater.

Mr. H. F. Medland, Hartley, Ia., writes:

> Through the columns of your Department kindly advise me concerning the following: I am building a new theater, or rather am going to use a brick store building already constructed. I have the operating room built at the extreme side of the room. The throw is 65 feet and the curtain is exactly central in the end of the room, making one side of the curtain 65 feet from the lens and the other 64. Will this give a good sharp picture on both sides or would it be better to move one side of the curtain one foot out so as to square it with the lens? I also want to know whether one exhaust fan, set exactly back of the curtain, a distance of four feet, would effect the picture in any way. We have 110 volt d. c. here and I am going to use a 6-A Power's machine in the new house. In closing let me say that the MOVING PICTURE WORLD and the handbook are winners for exhibitors.

Unfortunately, neighbor Midland, you have not given me the size of your picture, but assuming it to be 12 by 16, your picture would be approximately 5 inches higher on one side than on the other with the curtain set square with the wall. I do not think that the out-of-focus effect would be noticeable, if you stop your lens down to about ⅝ inch or may be ¾ inch by placing opaque paper rings against the front combination of the objective. The best way to determine this matter, assuming that you have a curtain that can readily be moved, would be to try it straight with the wall first, and then move it out if necessary. The objection to moving it out is that those seated near the front on the side where the curtain is moved out, will view the picture at a heavier angle, though the view from the other side of the house would be improved correspondingly. As to the fan, it would not effect the picture in the least providing it did not sway the curtain. If you use a cloth screen then you had better back it up with light lumber, or else keep it stretched very tightly, indeed, if you have a fan large enough to create a heavy current of air.

From Alabama.

Mr. Joe Jenkins, Opelika, Ala., contributes the following:

> I am operating in one of the most refined little houses in the south. We have a four-piece orchestra, composed of real musicians. The operating room equipment consists of one Power's Six and an Edison model B, taking current through a Fort Wayne compensarc, which gives excellent results. We use 40 amperes on a plain white curtain and get a clear, bright picture at 60 feet. I am remodeling my Edison and am putting on a two wing outside shutter, the same as I am using on my Power's Six. We do not get any flicker at all. The projectors are in first class condition, and let me give you a tip that they will remain that way. as long as I remain here as an operator. If all operators had a manager like the one I am working for there would not be nearly so much trouble. He is a real man and treats his operator with the consideration due him. His name is Jack Stallings. And now a few words about conditions in general. In this section of the country, they usually build quite a nice theater, and, after things are fixed up, the ordinary practice is to get a ten year old boy as operator. Some three weeks ago I went into a little theater in a town of about 6,000 people. The manager took me up to the operating room. There I found two boys, in short pants, who should have been in school. The projectors were a sight, all covered with oil, dirt and gum. Evidently, they had not been cleaned in months. One of the outside shutters was bent all out of shape and the other was in little better condition. There were no magazines on either machine, and the floor was littered with carbon stumps, papers and dirt of every description. The boys were neither of them more than ten years old. I am not telling you this because I am sore on any one, but because it is just cold facts. I believe that such lads should be ruled out, by law if necessary.

With which I fully agree. If Alabama managers are employing "operators" of this kind, they are not only endangering their audience and their own property, but are giving the business, as a whole, the blackest kind of a black eye, and I for one would surely like to see them out of business. Such conditions are intolerable. They are an outrage from every point of view, and the ultimate result will probably be that there will be a disaster and a lot of people will be hurt or killed. The state of Alabama will then enact drastic regulations, greatly to the horror of these imitation managers, who will then be the sufferers. They will, however, be entitled to no sympathy. The legal restrictions that are placed upon any business are generally brought about by the men within that business, either through abuse, neglect or greed. Apply that to the saloon business, the racetrack business. the drug business, the milk business, the banking business. the employment business. the moving picture business, or a hundred others that concern the public. and see if I am not right.

Voltmeters and Ammeters for the Operating Room.

For a long time the editor of this department has been quietly looking around for a practical voltmeter, which would be low in price and thoraround for a practical coltmeter and ammeter, which would be low in price and thoroughly reliable, for operating room use. He has at last discovered what he was looking for. The Weston Electrical Instrument Company produces direct current ammeters, reading up to 50 amperes, which they sell from $10.00 to $12.00, and d. c. voltmeters reading up to 150 volts for $10.50. These instruments are compact, well made, and I am assured that they are thoroughly reliable. They can be attached by any operator of ordinary intelligence. The same company produces an a. c. ammeter, registering up to 100 amperes, for $13.75, and voltmeters registering up to 150 volts for $14.75. These latter instruments are round, and about eight inches in diameter. They are thoroughly reliable and guaranteed in every way.

Now, there is no question of a doubt but that every operating room should have an ammeter and a voltmeter, attached to the wall within full view of the operator. Not only would these instruments enable him to gauge his light handily and accurately, but they would undoubtedly save their own cost in a very few months. I most emphatically advise managers to install both a voltmeter and an ammeter, the latter of size sufficient to register all the current used in the operating room. I cannot be too emphatic in this recommendation. I am firmly convinced that the installation of a voltmeter and an ammeter will be in every way beneficial, and, where a thoroughly reliable instrument can be had at such a price, it is poor policy to do without them.

The Why and Wherefore of Motor Action.

Mr. J. E. Sineworth, of Chicago, Illinois, writes as follows:

> In your handbook a very simple explanation of the action of a generator is given. Anyone reading that description will readily understand how current is generated, but what I do not understand is what causes the armature of a motor to revolve when the current is turned on. Will you favor us with a simple, understandable explanation of that proposition?

I cannot better answer brother Sinworth's question than by quoting the explanation given by Mr. J. W. Barber, London, England, in the "Bioscope" sometime since. It seems to me his explanation is about as plain and concise as the matter could be set forth.

When a current of electricity flows through a wire we know that lines of force encircle the wire. If such a wire be placed in an ordinary magnetic field, as between the poles of a magnet, then on one side of the wire the lines of force, both of the magnet and the wire, will be in the same direction, whilst on the other side they will be in opposition. It will thus be clear that a strong magnetic field will be produced on one side of the wire, whilst on the other side, where the lines of force are in operation, there would be what one might term a magnetic vacuum. This would, if the wires were free to move, cause the wire to travel in the direction of the weak field. We have here the simple effect which is the basic principle of the electric motor. A number of wires may be introduced into a magnetic field, but the principle is, nevertheless, the same. When current is switched on an electric motor, the current flowing around the field coils produces a parallel magnetic field between the pole faces, whilst the current flowing through the armature coils produces circular fields around the wires, and so owing to the concentration of magnetic line of force to one side of an armature wire and the rarification of the lines of force on the other side, the armature coils are drawn across the face of the magnet. There is actually on the one side, say, facing the north pole of the field magnet of the armature, a pull in the downward direction, and on the other side one in an upward direction, and so rotation of the armatures takes place.

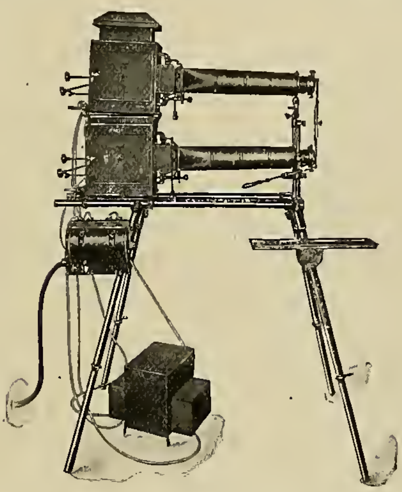
There is here an important point to remember when dealing with electric motors—current must never be directly or suddenly switched on at the motor terminals as it might be switched on to an electric lamp. The reason for this requires some explanation.

If an electric generator were supplying electric current to a number of lamps, and the driving belt removed with the machine running at full speed, one would hardly expect the dynamo to immediately stop generating. In fact we know that the machine would continue to generate—by the energy stored up in the machine—after the driving force had been removed. The pressure generated, however, would gradually diminish as the machine slackened. Bearing in mind that there is no difference except one of application, between an electric generator and an electric motor, consider such a machine receiving electricity from the supply mains running as an electric motor. If current were immediately switched off and a circuit of electric lamps or other apparatus immediately connected to the machine terminals, we should naturally expect that in this case the mechanical energy stored up in the machine would be converted into electricity, just as previously happened, when slowing up after running as a generator. Indeed, such would be the case, and the machine would act as a generator. We know, in fact, that whenever a coil of wire forming a part of a closed circuit cuts magnetic lines of force, an electric pressure is generated. It is clear that whenever an electric machine runs as a motor, coils of wire cut magnetic lines of force, and there is ever present a tendency for the machine to generate electricity. This action, known as dynamo action, is always present when an electric motor is running. A current of electricity is certainly not generated, but, nevertheless an electric pressure is in opposition to the pressure applied to the motor terminals. The effective pressure, therefore, on the motor winding is equal only to the applied pressure minus the back pressure or back electro motive force and the current flowing through the coils is equal not to the applied pressure divided by the resistance, as in other electric apparatus, but to the applied pressure less the back pressure, that is, the current consumed by an electric motor is equal to the difference of pressure divided by the resistance. When running at full speed, the back E. M. F. of an electric motor is almost equal to the applied E. M. F. so that, with a given armature resistance, a relatively small current would be consumed. It is clear, however, that when running at a slow speed fewer lines of force are cut per second, and the back E. M. F. is, therefore, considerably low. For this reason, owing to the increased difference in pressure there would be, when a motor is not running at full speed a considerable increase in current flow which would have a most harmful effect on the windings of the machine. We know that with ordinary electrical apparatus running on constant pressure, the resistance is the determining factor of current flow. When dealing with motors, however, we can afford almost to ignore resistance and consider the back E. M. F. in its place. When a motor is stationary there can be no back pressure, and so the windings of the armature, are, to all intents and purposes, a dead short circuit to the supply mains. Outside, resistance then, must always be introduced in circuit with the armature whilst a motor is running up to speed. In practice, a variable resistance is switched "all in" in series, with the motor, and gradually cut out step by step as the machine gains in speed and the back E. M. F. increases.

Take a concrete illustration: the resistance of the armature windings of a certain 100 volt motor may be ¼ ohm. What current would flow if full pressure were switched on? Obviously, by Ohm's Law, 400 amperes—a current sufficient to burn out and utterly destroy the windings of the machine. When rotating at full speed the back E. M. F. may be 97 volts, making the difference of pressure three volts only. In this case the current flow would be 3 divided by ¼ equal 12 amperes. Designers would naturally proportion the windings of the machine to carry this current, and, considering that anything much in excess would be extremely harmful to the motor, what external resistance would be necessary to limit the current to this figure when starting? The problem resolves itself into: What total resistance is necessary to limit a flow of current to 12 amperes under a pressure of 100 volts? By Ohm's Law 100 divided by 12 equals 8½ ohms. Therefore, if the winding were known to have a resistance of ¼ ohm, an extra and external resistance of just over 8 ohms, would necessarily have to be introduced to limit the current to 12 amperes at the moment of switching on. By using a variable resistance up to 8 ohms, all resistance can be switched on to start, and as the back E. M. F. increases, the external resistance can be reduced accordingly, until, with all resistance cut out, the machine runs at full speed, with the full generating back E. M. F. compensating for the resistance.

A New Dissolver.

The Nicholas Power Company has just placed on the market a new dissolver, illustrated herewith. This machine is all metal. Attached to one of the front legs is a metal table for holding the slide box. The arrangement for adjusting the lenses is new, original and unique. I might add that it is also very effective. The distance of the condenser from the lens is changed by shifting the whole lamp house base and rear legs along the side rods. The lamps are the regular No. 6, and amply heavy for the service. The rheostat consists of two adjustable units in one case, which is a very convenient arrangement indeed. The whole dissolver is compact, convenient and excellent. Heavy telescope legs are used, their lower end being embedded in a casting, so that the whole thing is firm and, particularly if anchored down to the floor, free from vibration.



Wanting to Join Both Organizations.

Brother C. Wallis, Hamilton, Ont., says:

> In reference to your answer to my letter of July 5th, I did misunderstand Brother Basson. The moving picture operators' local most emphatically should not be auxiliary to spot light men. I, for one, think Mr. Basson made a move in the right direction when he wrote that letter. With reference to my suggestion that operators join the T. M. A., I meant to suggest that they join both organizations.

As regards the T. M. A. suggestion, I cannot agree with Brother Wallis. In fact, I believe it would be impracticable for the operator to belong to both organizations, as there might, at any time, be a conflict of authority.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"THE TAMING OF TEXAS PETE" (Selig), July 30.—Texas Pete (William Duncan) is a troublesome drunkard. He is on a shootin' jamboree when he meets a child who insists on his carrying her home. He get's a job at the ranch of the child's father and then becomes the hero of a story. At the end there is a brisk muscular struggle. It is a commercial offering with the qualities that the people like and it moves along freely. The author is Joseph Poland, and it was produced by William Duncan. The photography is acceptable.

"THE HAUNTED HOUSE" (Patheplay), July 30.—The story, though thoroughly commercial, is fair, for it not only has something going on all the time, but it does, for a moment, make us feel something strange and wierd about that ramshackle place called the haunted house. Yet it is not deep or big in any way, for it takes a queer, not logical or convincing, way to work out its intention—to make friends of the two fuedists. In most pictures it is the children who bring about the reconciliation; but here it is the old people. It is fairly acted and clear in its photography.

"THE SIXTH COMMANDMENT" (Vitagraph), July 30.—A dance hall opening, with the usual Western atmosphere of such places which is neither new nor pleasant, doesn't help this picture with its spectators. It has a melodramatic ending with effective contrasts and enough of the unexpected that convinces to compel attention and even interest. The photography is only so so. Ned Finley is the author and W. J. Bauman the producer.

"A DASH FOR LIBERTY" (Lubin), July 30.—The only weakness in this picture as an offering of entertainment is its lack of a character to excite our sympathy. It's a detective and criminal story and its feature is an exciting chase by a girl detective of a bank thief, and this takes place on locomotives. It is unusual, carefully thought out, convincing, and as effective as can be. It shows Romaine Fielding at his best, as a producer, but as a writer, though very clever, not in his most human vein. Mary Ryan plays the girl thief-catcher—she deserved all the remuneration she got for the work. This offering ought to add to its producer's reputation and to its leading woman's popularity, as having grit, not because such a character is attractive. The photography, which was not easy to get, is of good quality.

"BIRDS OF PREY" (Kalem), July 30.—Of today's dramas the subject matter of this is the best, by all odds. Like all the others today, except the comedy, it is a bit distressing; but, unlike the others, it is instructive or, at least, substantial; it leaves an impression and gets somewhere. The birds of prey are the private detectives, dishonest lawyers and all who stoop to make profit of the trouble of others. In this case they prey upon an ex-crook who is "on the square" once more. As a whole, it is convincing and real, although there are one or two weaker spots. It would have been better to have had the shyster himself apply to the arrested man rather than expect the prisoner to take the advice of the crook detective who had, and he knew it, "planted a frame-up" on him. There are some good things in it, well-taken scenes, natural acting, etc., but its best is the shyster's wife, who is a truly emotional actress. A good offering.

"AS THE TOOTH CAME OUT" (Edison), July 30.—Mark Swan must have had to take gas at his dentist's recently—the quality of his picture shows it, suggests that he has inside information. It is an extravagant farce that the audience seemed to enjoy greatly and that is a worthy offering—a good specimen of Producer C. J. Williams's work. William Wadsworth plays Mr. Aik who is "annoyed by the nerve of his tooth" (an excellent sub-title). Said tooth after it is extracted follows him out of the office and chases him a mile then back. When anyone comes out of gas, the dentist looks like the devil, and in this comedy Dan Mason makes a very good Dr. Pullem, with horns. Mrs. C. J. Williams plays the attendant and Alice Washburn is another patient. The photography is perfect.

"THE GRAND CANYON OF ARIZONA" (Edison). July 30.—On the same reel with the foregoing this travel picture will be acceptable. It is impressive.

"BREAD UPON THE WATERS" (Essanay), July 30.—The general idea behind this offering is good, but the story is forced and not sincerely imagined. Mrs. Prestige's character sketch, though slight, is the most worthy thing in the whole picture; she plays the old nurse. That many people will like it for the sake of its idea and the fact that it shows how a weak man's kindness at one time is the means of his salvation when he has fallen is not improbable. But to make it a love story was a very bad mistake.

"THOSE LITTLE FLOWERS" (Biograph), July 31.—A very amusing farce comedy with quite some punch. It is well made and acted in a sprightly way. There was some hearty laughter and the audience very plainly liked it. Gus Pixley and Kate Tonquay play a comic couple.

"MR. SPRIGS BUYS A DOG" (Biograph), July 31).—This lively farce on the same reel made even more laughter than did the former one. It is good, too, but in a different way, and the two go very well together. This is clever and on the French type, with rough and tumble business. Together they make a first-class comic offering.

"TIT FOR TAT" (Essanay), July 31.—A commercial farce comedy offering; the audience laughed a little over it. We find some fun in the situation, but there is very little that is new and no humor that is spontaneous in it.

"THROUGH THE CUMBERLAND MOUNTAINS" (Essanay), July 31.—Clearly photographed scenes taken mostly from the front of a locomotive going through the mountains of Tennessee. There is a fine character study in the face of an old darkie man. It will interest.

"WHEN SOCIETY CALLS" (Vitagraph), July 31.—A picture of sentiment, written by Eugene Mullin, commercially, to sell. The author has cleverly chosen things that have pleased audiences many times before and has skilfully put them together to please again. It was dry to us, but not to all in the audience. In all these offerings there is a great sameness in the characters and in the feelings excited in us by what they do. It starts in with some views of sordid society life, then works up our pity for a neglected child and prepares us for its pathetic ending. Wilfred North produced it. Courtenay Foote has part as an old man; but the character adds nothing to the result.

"MAN AND HIS OTHER SELF" (Selig), July 31.—A country romance. The only thing new in it is the method in which the man's better self appears on the opposite side of the table to argue and plead with his lower self. It was written and produced by Lem Parker. Thomas Santschi plays a man who loves a country girl so well that he gives back to her father a mortgage he holds, but, in the city, enjoys the company of fast women. It does not strongly convince, because of little things. That was a poor kind of photograph for a simple farmer's daughter. The farmer himself is not like a real farmer. Mr. Santschi and the farmer's wife are the only well-cast figures.

"THE FATAL SCAR" (Lubin), July 31.—Romaine Fielding is one of the best and most original producers in the business, but this is not one of his best pictures. He doesn't appear in it himself nor has he succeeded in getting real life into it. It doesn't convince, and then we have little sympathy left for the hero, once a highwayman, now engaged to a rich girl and afraid of his former comrade.

"IT HAPPENED IN JAVA" (Melies), July 31.—A farce produced in one of the magnificent temples of Java. Some fine and deeply interesting views of the glorious edifice of Boro Boedeor are shown, but the farce seems more of an interruption than a help, at least to cultivated people. The trouble is with the players, who act the story in an almost silly way. The photography is clear and as there is much of very deep interest in the backgrounds we think it will go with most audiences strongly, in spite of all drawbacks. The temples are Boro Boedeor, a ruined wonder of the world, and a smaller temple, Mendoet.

"THE CALL OF THE BLOOD" (Patheplay), July 31.—A commercial offering dealing with a white girl stolen twenty years before the story opens by Indians and now a squaw. Her brother finds her with the help of a cowboy. She has blond hair like a white woman, and parts her hair on the side, hardly like an Indian. Then she can talk to her brother in some language, but, more wonderful still, she can write to him.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 37." (July 31).—There are some excellent items in this mid-week topical and they are clearer in photography than usual.

"THE LATE MR. JONES" (Vitagraph), August 6.—A sea-side farce of summer love-making by middle-aged folks. It is of such light stuff as commercially written farces usually are—just nonsense to make fun. There is no doubt that it amused the audience; it made some of them laugh. The players, Louise Beaudet and Sidney Drew, know how to be entertaining. It was produced by James Young, and George Cameron wrote the script. The photography is clear.

"THE STOLEN MOCCASINS" (Selig), August 6.—A typical Western offering by William Duncan and his usual company. The heroine (Myrtle Stedman) refuses the villain (Lester Cunio) who steals three moccasins from an Indian (Tom Mix). With two pals he abducts the girl and sets fire to the cabin (accidentally). The foot-tracks are seen and the Indians accused by the hero (William Duncan), but they prove themselves guiltless by finding the culprits and helping the hero save the girl. The cabin burns in a lively way and the action, not original, doesn't drag. It is clearly photographed in most scenes.

"THEIR PROMISE" (Essanay), August 6.—A picture by the Western company. The plot is weak and the action is not true to life. We are not sure that it was not intended to be a farce; what entertainment it affords is from the farcical quality in what it shows and from the players who are not without knowledge of how to please. The photography is clear.

"THE GRAND CANYON OF NEW YORK" (Patheplay), August 6.—We have had other glimpses of the Ausable Chasm in motion pictures, but we do not think it has been photographed so completely before. More than half a thousand feet has been given to views of the falls, rocks and rapids in the beautiful chasm of the Adirondack Mountains. The quality of the photographs is fair, sometimes being beautifully clear, sometimes rather obscure.

"IN SAMOA" (Patheplay), August 6.—Some well photographed and very interesting glimpses of native life in Samoa. It is a very good picture, much more interesting than the ordinary travel offering.

"SHIPWRECKED" (Kalem), August 6.—This two-reel special offering will prove a good number with audiences of all kinds and in all places, for it combines, with action and romance of a popular nature, a reflection on human life and fate that will give to the thoughtful spectator something to ponder on and consider. It uses the scenario of J. M. Barrie's, "The Admirable Crichton," but changes the last scene to be more applicable to American audiences. In fact, Barrie's fine sarcasm in making the Admirable Crichton go back to his valeting on his return to England was lost, thank heaven, on Americans. The backgrounds against which the action is set are such as have been used by another Association firm in recent pictures with Zulus in the casts. It is a truly tropical seashore, with palms and bananas growing. The sands, the clumps of rough palms, the rolling surf and the savages give the correct atmosphere of romance and Robinson Crusoe Land which gives the offering great merit as entertainment. The adapter of the picture keeps his story flowing smoothly and naturally. There is some padding, not a great deal. The players (Anna Nilson and Guy Coombs have the romantic roles) do very well indeed. A pleasing figure is the heroine's sister, but the sailors and all, even to the least, are natural. The photography is splendid in some scenes and clear in nearly all.

"THE ROMANCE OF ROWENA" (Edison), August 6.—A very pleasing little romantic comedy by Bannister Merwin. One finds from the very opening scene good atmosphere in the characters and especially in Frank Lyon and Mrs. Wallace Erskine. Mary Fuller is charming in her role of the romantic Rowena, in which she is perfectly at home. We haven't seen her do such lively work as this in months. The author doesn't deserve most credit for this offering; perhaps the producer (C. Jay Williams) does, although a good deal belongs to the players, among whom Edward O'Connor, as the footman, has his share. It is a merry picture to delight an audience.

"THE PENALTIES OF REPUTATION" (Vitagraph), August 7.—A love story, carefully written, except that the scene in the man's bedroom which closed the picture seemed an easy way out, rather than a very probable ending. The staging and the acting are artistic and graceful and also most convincing. It is filled with bits of real life and is sure to please those who like a picture that appeals to their intelligence as well as to their feelings. The story is slight. Two young people are invited to spend a few days at the home of mutual friends and fall in love with each other. The man has a reputation as a flirt and the girl mistrusts his attentions. Eliza Harrel is the writer and William Humphrey, the producer. He also plays the male lead opposite to Dorothy Kelly, the charming heroine. Charlotta de Felice and Rankin Drew play the friends.

"THE GALLOPING ROMEO" (Selig), August 7.—A great many in the audience got a good deal of fun from this farce produced by William Duncan and his usual company. There is nothing new in it and very little spontaneous humor. An audience that is particular will not care for it much, but, in some places, it will go strongly.

"THE GROCER'S REVENGE" (Selig), August 7.—Just a joke on a miser. The grocer catches him putting a pound of butter slyly in his hat and makes him sit near the hot fire till the melted grease runs down his face. We missed the point at first and were not sure the butter had been taken at all. It would have been better to have shown it clearer. It is short and made a laugh.

"THE INCRIMINATING LETTER" (Essanay), August 7.—The letter refers to a dog and when twice misunderstood nearly breaks up two happy homes. The situation, used twice in this one picture, is far from fresh, but it has been pretty well produced and there is a good touch of snappy action at the end. All the value the offering has comes from the players and the producer. It is clearly photographed.

"AN INTIMATE STUDY OF A MOLE" (Essanay), August 7.—This is a short offering with some photographs of a ground mole that are not at all intimate, although clear.

"UNDER THE SHADOW OF THE LAW" (Biograph), August 7.—A lurid melodrama full of action, but with the improbabilities usually found in such. In the first half there is suspense, but this evaporates in the second half through the unconvincing quality of the action which is also very conventional. There are many people who, before such an offering, will "eat it up with their eyes"; but it will hardly go strongly with spectators who are particular or very intelligent. The photography is clear through the greater portion of it.

"WHEN A WOMAN WASTES" (Patheplay), August 7.—A very lurid melodrama. It was doubtless made to suit a clearly defined type of audience. It is such a picture as might give an intelligent audience amusement, solely because it is a good specimen of what the other kind of audience likes. The photography is clear enough to keep the story plain, but not artistic or full of life. There are some extremely pretty backgrounds, but they are not brought out well by the camera. Such a story is not possible to act and the players were too intelligent to seem natural in their roles. For the right audience it will please because it has something going on all the time; the thousand feet are wonderfully packed with action.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 39" (August 7).—A good picture of Edward Payson Weston on the tramp and eating his lunch at the roadside, and a glimpse of Sing Sing prison with one of the "mutiny squads" on its way to Auburn Prison are among other items of passing interest in this midweek's topical. It is a good number.

"THE CAMERA'S TESTIMONY" (Lubin), August 7.—A cheap, commercial story by Wilbert Melville. It is an easy situation to arrange, the setting up of a camera in the woods so that the first thing that passes will spring the trap and have its photograph taken; for, when it is done, anything at all that goes on in the neighborhood is quite sure to be revealed and it is not hard to have any sort of crime committed, some innocent one accused and then have "the camera's testimony" clear him.

"SNAPSHOTS OF JAVA" (Melies), August 7.—There is an individuality behind these photographs. He is like other people, too; he is interested in the same things that we are, things that seem to us worth while seeing. The average spectator will be entertained and instructed by his offering. He is no dry-as-dust man, but a good representative of the spectator to choose for the spectator things out of Java that he wants to see. It is pretty clear in photography and makes an excellent travel offering.

"A GENTLEMAN OF FASHION" (Vitagraph), August 8.—John Bunny plays as a plumber who, once a week, goes forth as a "gentleman of fashion." Flora Finch plays as a very romantic spinster of great wealth. They meet. He thinks her a shop girl and she thinks that he is what he appears to be. The situation is cleverly carried on and makes a very amusing offering. Frances Cook is the authoress and George Baker, the producer. The audience seemed to enjoy it much and there was hearty laughter.

"HER HUSBAND'S WIFE" (Lubin), August 8.—A farce with a daring situation and not badly worked up; yet we can't call it a first-class offering. Perhaps the Producer, Arthur Johnson, wasn't in the mood for a farce. His work has some strangely weak points. That procession of the boarders into the hotel dining room wasn't good, nor was the jumping into the foreground of those two young people just after Johnson learns that his wife is at his aunt's, where he knows is his queer visitor whom he had been embarrassed into introducing as his wife. That "accident" is too thin (it might have been the fault of George Terwilliger, the author) and the secondary love story isn't farcical at all. One can imagine an ending in which Lottie Briscoe, after forcing Florence Hackett to listen to her explanation, would be seen with face desperate to get away from those queer people. The photography is clear.

"RESCUING DAVE" (Essanay), August 8.—A weak story; quite arbitrary in establishing its situation and not convincing. The players are not wholly natural and do not manage to get much atmosphere in their picture. There is some clear photography.

"MR. RYHE REFORMS" (Essanay), August 8.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this extravaganza farce in which Mr. Ryhe, a hard drinker, has the nightmare and swears off. The nightmare is the picture's feature and makes it a much better offering as entertainment than the other on this reel. We are shown the dreadful heads that appear to the sleeping drunkard. They are paper masks and cleverly changed to make the transformations.

"GENOA, PRINCIPAL PORT OF ITALY" (Patheplay), August 8.—A very interesting series of views of the famous city that is still the most important port in Italy. These pictures are clear and fresh. They are worth seeing, although the offering is rather scrappy. Genoa ought to have had a full reel.

"MOUNT ST. MICKEL" (Patheplay), August 8.—On the same reel is this beautiful picture of that wonderful island off the northern shore of France and of which so many post card pictures and the like have been printed. It is a curious and romantic looking place. The offering is valuable, for everyone should know something about Mount St. Mickel.

"HIS GREATEST VICTORY" (Edison), August 8.—One or two very pretty scenes help out this offering some, but there is very little first-class entertainment in it. The story, by Paul McAllister, depends upon the loss of memory of a Union officer during a battle in the Civil War. This officer is dressed so that when he, on coming to his senses, gives his coat away to another wounded comrade, he is taken for a private—he can't tell who or what he is. The producer, George Lessey, has not been careful to make many of his scenes natural. The opening scene is not strong. There are apt to be too many players in these war-time love scenes in all makes of pictures; it leaves them formal and artificial. Gertrude McCoy is the heroine and the picture's one effective character.

"HOBO AND HOBBLE SKIRT" (Kalem), August 8.—A light-hearted fun maker with Ruth Roland and John Brennan as a newly married couple. The hobo is not the one who wears the hobble skirt, but John. The hobo had taken his last suit, left out to dry—wifey had sent all the others to the cleaner's. There is going to be a surprise party at their house and many comical things are rung into the picture. The players are past masters at fun making and in their hands this offering is acceptable entertainment. The audience here seemed to enjoy it.

"CONEY ISLAND" (Kalem), August 8.—A very interesting picture. It is likely to make many people want to see Coney for themselves. As an offering, it has high merit on its own account; there are good laughs in it.

"MISS 'ARABIAN NIGHTS'" (Essanay), August 8.—A millionairess (May Buckley) weary of the stupid folk about her, slips away, Haroun Al Rachid wise, to a boarding house where ordinary people live between their struggles for a living. At the place she meets the poor inventor, the actor out of a job, the playwright, and the poor girl painter, and uses her wealth in making them all happy. Was it not "The Ladies Home Journal" that a few years ago ran a series from the diary of a girl of means who really did do something of the kind? The story isn't great, but there's a pleasing quality to it and it has a popular subject. Some of the sets are graceful. A fair offering Hattie Gray Baker is the author and the producer is Oscar Eagle. The sub-titles are carelessly done and have one or two glaring faults.

" HOUSE OF MYSTERY" (Cines), August 8.—A detective story in two parts. It gets the spectator interested in its situation and holds him pretty well to the end, with its climax effective in accumulated excitement. The average spectator in all kinds of audiences will probably count it a very satisfactory offering and be willing to pay to see more pictures like it. It ranks above the average of detective stories, its chief weakness being that it is just a bit too long. The "house of mystery" has trap doors, an underground banquet hall, as in Zigomar, dungeons, etc. There is a sense of mystery about it that is kept up well. The acting is acceptable at all times and the photography is clear.

"THE FLIGHT OF THE CROW" (Selig), August 11.—A very interesting two-reel special. The best about it is that it tells a fine story; one that will make it popular with all kinds of people. We dare commend it as a desirable special offering. The "Crow" is a tramp, son of a rich man. He had been disinherited for drunkenness, but his father, on his death bed, has relented and the sweetheart of the heroine, the "Crow's" foster sister, goes out as a hobo to find him, followed by a detective in the employ of the rich man's lawyer, who doesn't want the son forgiven. The love story here is secondary to the tramp story, which is a novel and pleasing bit of romance. Henry Otto plays the "Crow," H. A. Livingston, the man who goes out to find him; William Hutchinson, an engaging tramp who helps Livingston; Kathlyn Williams, the foster sister and heroine. All do creditable work. The photography is clear. The author is Arthur Preston Hankins whose script A. E. Martin produced.

"THE REFORMERS" (Biograph), August 9.—This satyre, in two parts, is aimed at busybodies, legitimate game; the satyrist who makes fun of them is sure to have the audience with him. This picture won many and many a good laugh. But the humor that made the laughter is never a part of the satyre itself, of the cutting edge. It never is of any satyre until it reaches a very high plane, like Cervantes's Don Quixote, for instance. A satyre is sanity looking at insanity, the former being the spectator and the latter the one whom the spectator knows is in the wrong. This picture is a close enough approximation to this condition to be a very profitable release from the exhibitor's viewpoint. The laughter is mostly due to William Murray, though Christy Miller tickled them too. Charles Mailes plays the mayor, leader of the busybodies. Mae March and Walter Harron play his two children. Miss March carries the tragic role with imagination and powerful effect. She is a fine actress in emotional work. The photography is clear.

"THE ALIBI" (Kalem), August 9.—Opens with a rough tussel in a Western eating house and its second scene is an argument in a saloon. These scenes provide the materials for a circumstantial evidence case, with the murderer accusing the hero. The alibi cannot be proved at once, so the man's sister, dressed as a man, holds off the sheriff, her husband, for several hours. There is the usual chase and pistol fight up in the hills. It makes a good commercial offering with action, but nothing new. The photography is only fair. Helen Holmes plays the heroine.

"FOR HER SISTER'S SAKE" (Kalem), August 11.—The story is weak; it is not convincing and not romantic, even unpleasant. A flirtatious man (Tom Moore) is engaged to a girl (Ethel Phillips), but encounters another girl (Alice Joyce) and flirts with her. He doesn't know that she is Ethel's sister. As this situation is developed we are left supposing that the elder sister has committed suicide to make room for Alice, but the end proves that she only pretended to. The interiors are clearly photographed, but the exteriors are not up to the Kalem standard.

"WHEN TONY PAWNED LOUISA" (Lubin), August 9.—There is a truly remarkable situation in this picture in which an Italian pawns his sweetheart. The situation "gets over" well enough, but the feature of the picture is the grace and prettiness of Louisa (Ethel Clayton) who is not dressed like a poor immigrant. It is a clean, not unpleasant, story, and the leading woman makes the offering commendable as entertainment. The photography is good.

"BRONCHO BILLY AND THE NAVAJO MAID" (Essanay), August 9.—This story has been told very often in pictures, each time with small differences. There is action and it is not slow. For those who have not seen too many pictures it will be a good offering; there were a number of such in the audience this morning.

"A WOMAN'S WAY" (Patheplay), August 9.—A picture of contemptable people and of colorless people; there is no one in the cast with whom it is easy to sympathize, and this is the picture's weak point. The story is interesting and has some freshness, but has not been made effective. The chief weakness is the lack of clear-cut coherence in the characters; we are not sure which are good and which are bad and don't like any of them.

"FATHER AND SON" (Vitagraph Special), August 9.—The title of this picture does not hit the mark as well as its secondary title, "The Curse of the Golden Land." It is an immigration story of how a poor Russian fellow left his wife and boy to seek a fortune in America. He succeeded, but neglected his family for society. The wife and boy came over in time to save him from committing bigamy. This is a story of a condition that is true in a great many cases and among our foreign population it will strike home with telling force. As a good piece of drama it will, no doubt, be relished by any class of society, because it has in it the touch of nature that makes the whole world kin. The photography is excellent and a number of the scenes were taken in the sweatshops of New York. The principal part, Wolf Salzman, is played by Mr. Courtenay Foote in artistic and convincing manner. One of those deep foreign street scenes, for which the Vitagraph is noted, is used in this picture. It is a good offering.

"BY FIRE AND WATER" (Edison), August 9.—A fair commercial offering by Ashley Miller, featuring a fire on a large naptha launch, which is well suggested, though we have seen even better ones. The story is melodramatic with a well-dressed man shown-up as a coward and a roughly-dressed man proving himself a hero indeed. Herbert Prior plays the hero, who runs a little lake launch for picnics. His wife (Mabel Trunnelle) notices a difference between the fine uniform of a competing captain (Richard Neill) and her husband's suit. Then we have the picnic and the fire with its rescue. The minister is, as often in Edison pictures, burlesqued and made unpleasant. The backgrounds are pretty lake scenes and the photography is fair.

"THE TREASURE OF CAPTAIN KIDD" (Edison), August 11.—The opening scene of this picture is a perfectly photographed and beautiful glimpse of the beach with billows rolling up. Gladys Hulette and Edwin Clark, as modern lovers, are discovered seated on a bit of drift-wood, recalling the romantic story of the notorious pirate. In perfect double exposure views, we see the ghost of the terrible man (Bigelow Cooper, who gesticulates too much to be very terrible) and his crew pass. Before we know it we are looking at Kidd's story. Some of the scenes are wonderfully effective (that in which the treasure is being carried up the beach is a perfectly arranged or composed scene), but some scenes are much weaker, mostly on account of melodramatic over-emphasis. Laura Sawyer plays the heroine of the captain's love story and does very well. The story is not dramatic enough to get us interested in the captain for more that a scene or two, but there is a good deal in it that will hold interest in the picture. Cromwell Childe is the author of the script, which was produced by Richard Ridgely.

"WHEN THE PRESS SPEAKS" (Vitagraph), August 11.—A farcical romance that made some laughter, yet is not quite up to the best Bunny-Finches. The trouble is that the characters lack atmosphere. Flora Finch, a newspaper woman who is bound to get an interview with the noted woman-hater, John Bunny, is the exception. Though, of course, Bunny is himself, his role gives him no good chance for humor. The rest of the figures are, without exception, insipid. That secret fraternity house was not very effective.

"EVERY DOUBLE CAUSES TROUBLE" (Patheplay), August 12.—A Whiffles picture in which the well-known comedian plays, as often, a double role. It made the audience laugh several times, but it seemed to us not quite up to the best Whiffles pictures. The photography is clear.

"THE BROKEN VASE" (Selig), August 12.—A picture without much substance. It is weekly acted and we do not dare commend it very highly as entertainment. The photography is clear. The author is Edward Hungerford and the producer is Hardee Kirkland.

"THE MAGICIAN FISHERMAN" (Selig), August 12.—A very slight offering on the same reel; it made no laughter that we heard.

"THE JOYS OF A JEALOUS WIFE" (Vitagraph), August 12.—A picture on shipboard in which Georgia Maurice plays very realistically and effectively a jealous wife. Maurice Costello plays her spouse and he will not be blamed for wanting to get a minute or so of freedom from her, though the friend (James Young) he persuaded to wear his hat and coat may question the means. It makes fun, but it comes too precious near being a tragedy to be wholly comic. The author is Georgia Maurice and the producer Maurice Costello. It is well photographed.

"BINGLES' NIGHTMARE" (Vitagraph), August 12.—James Lackaye, after a good dinner, dreams that the world is kind and considerate—it is only a dream as he finds when he awakes. To see a waiter refuse a tip, as in the dream, amuses, and to see a trolley car come back when it has gone past a would-be passenger makes the audience laugh. Flora Finch plays Bingles' wife in the dream. We are not shown what she does to Bingles when he is awake. It is clearly photographed and, with the other offering on the same reel, it seemed to please. Roy Hanaford is the author and Ralph Ince produced it.

"I WAS MEANT FOR YOU" (Biograph), August 11.—One sees construction in the scenario of this picture which is very melodramatic and not powerfully convincing. A close resemblance between the two leading men makes for confusion at one or two points. There is some fair acting. As an offering it is so so.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 40" (August 11).—This topical is always welcome to an audience.

"THE RIGHTFUL HEIR" (Edison), August 12.—A picture taken from Sir Gilbert Parker's story, "The Lane that has no Turning." There is much in the offering to commend it. Charles Sutton, as the hunchback seigneur, and more especially Laura Sawyer, as his wife, put color and imagination into their parts. Benjamin Wilson, as Fournel, and James Gordon, as Tardif, with the others who have small roles, do commendable work. The story is clear, except the cause of Fournel's burning of the will—the trouble lies in the man's acting in what immediately preceded it, The scenario, by the famous author, is weak and unconvincing. The producer is J. Searle Dawley. There is some excellent photography. A very fair offering.

"THE EDGE OF THINGS" (Essanay), August 12.—A story of a young ranchman and his wife. There is an Eastern partner who comes on a visit, and partner and wife are soon in each other's arms. The object is to make a sensational struggle between the two men over the edge of a cliff. The picture's backgrounds are fine. It includes some Wild West Show things and some good views of a herd of cattle. The photography is fair.

"INTO THE LIGHT" (Lubin), August 12.—A commercial melodrama very much like many others we have seen. It is very fairly acted and has some excellent photography. There is nothing else for which it can be especially commended; but it tells a story though an old one and will serve to entertain many people. The author is Mrs. Nicholls and the producer is George Nicholls. Ormi Hawley and Edwin Carewe have the romantic leads. Ernestine Morley is the poor sister, Irving White, the poor husband, and Earle Metcalf, the villain.

Independent

"THE MISSING WITNESS" (Thanhouser), August 12.—A two-part film story, in which the characters are all given special introduction, one at a time. There seemed a little too much preparation for this story, as the main incident did not occur till the second reel. The court room scenes were well handled and the observer has considerable sympathy for the widow of the ruined county treasurer, whose testimony alone can save the boss from conviction as a murderer. Her conscience finally leads her to clear him, in spite of the fact that he brought ruin and death to her husband. Some of the situations are a little weak from a dramatic standpoint, but it holds the interest.

"PEARL AND THE TRAMP" (Crystal), August 17.—A fairly interesting half reel, in which Chester appears as a tramp and invades the home of Pearl. He succeeds in quieting the baby for her.

"ONE WIFE TOO MUCH" (Crystal), August 17.—A once highly amusing plot in the days of "Jane" and other noted predecessors. There may be a new audience for this old story of the borrowed wife and child, but to most observers it is apt to lack novelty. On same reel with above.

"SUCCESS" (Reliance), August 23.—A two-reel story by Forrest Halsey, containing numerous strong points and some weak ones. The hero declares he would sell his soul for success and on this is based a modern version of the Faust episode. A character, representing the devil, pursues the hero all through the picture. Irving Cummings is at his best in this, and Irene Hunt gives a strong impersonation of the poor girl artist. The theater scenes are appealing and also the dinner scene, but the idea of toasting the great failures of the world seems to us a too decided jump from romance to realism, and rather upset the unfolding of the plot. The picture, however, has much to commend it in spite of its rather peculiar ending.

"WAITING FOR HUBBY" (Thaohouser), August 17.—A thoroughly amusing picture, in which Riley Chamberlin impersonates on old-style actor of the Shakesperian school. He marries a wealthy widow, but later pines for a night out with the boys. She sends him out to mail a letter and he comes back many hours later after some very laughable experiences. Mr. Chamberlin has the true comedy sense and succeeds in giving us a truly funny "jag" where many others have failed.

"THE DEVILISH DOCTOR" (Majestic), August 9.—In which Fred Mace, as the young doctor, dresses as the devil to attend a masquerade ball. There is a highly amusing chase scene in this.

"A FISH STORY" (Majestic), August 9.—The girl's father agrees to give her to the young man who catches the largest fish. During this contest one of the lovers falls in the water and the other pulls out a very large fish. Quite entertaining. On same reel with above.

"THE LIE THAT FAILED" (Thanhouser), August 15.—A falling meteor forms an interesting, though highly improbable, feature of this story. It falls upon a husband who had just decided to commit suicide and accuse his wife of poisoning him. The story is not of the strongest, but is quite novel and well pictured.

"THE GREATEST LOVE" (Majestic), August 10.—A rejected lover tries to break up the girl's engagement with a rival. He succeeds for a time through the aid of an adventuress, but later the adventuress accuses him of a crime she herself committed. The action is a little too hurried, but the scenes are attractive and the photography very good.

"THE SPIRIT OF ENVY" (Thanhouser), August 19.—A picture so thoroughly natural that its story will appeal to many people. The young clerk's wife is very envious of her former school chum, whose husband is a banker. At her friend's party the young wife is ashamed of her clothes and very miserable, until the young banker is accused of embezzlement. Then she thinks better of her own lot. The human touch gives it appeal.

"THE DOCTOR'S RUSE" (Majestic), August 12.—A Fred Mace picture, in which he invades Bunkville as a fledgling doctor. Lacking business, he proceeds to hire a tramp to act as a smallpox patient. In due time he is raking in unlimited sums of money in vaccination fees. All goes well 'till the girl's father, also a doctor, appears on the scene. Quite an amusing film.

"FLESH OF HIS FLESH" (American), August 23.—This story gets a good start, but ends rather weakly. The couple are granted a divorce in the beginning, the child going to the husband. Later the mother steals her boy. Years pass and the father, now sheriff, is called upon to arrest his own son, without knowing who he is. The final situation is carefully led up to, but lacked the necessary feeling to give it the strongest appeal.

"THE GOLDEN HEART" (American), August 21.—A Western offering in which the story is rather slow in starting, but quite entertaining when it comes. The young prospector and his girl join forces. Their claim is jumped, but they find their location notice in an old tomato can and thus regain possession.

"A CHIP OF THE OLD BLOCK" (Keystone), August 14.—This reel begins with a rather neat flirtation between a widow and a widower, and a separate flirtation between their two children. The four meet at the beach later and the children begin trying out the various "concessions." The Dippy Dip finally claims their attention and quite a novel comedy situation results. For light nonsense of an inoffensive sort this is quite enjoyable.

"THE HERITAGE OF EVE" (Broncho), August 20.—A two-reel war drama, in which a mother and son act as spies in the home of Southern friends. The acting in this is up to the standard, but the plot is rendered unpleasant by the lack of honor on the part of the spies. Even though the mother relents toward the close, when she desires to marry the colonel, the harm has been done and this change of heart does not get the obsrver's sympathy. The fighting scenes were brisk, but as a whole the production is not very appealing.

"HER TUTORS" (Eclair), August 17.—A rather old-fashioned plot, in which the lover disguises himself as a dancing teacher and again as a music teacher in order to win his sweetheart. There is hardly enough novelty in this to make it particularly interesting.

"THIRST FOR GOLD" (Eclair), August 13.—A two-reel offering of rather uncertain setting and costuming, but we think the story is intended to happen in Civil War days. The military surgeon mistakes a case of catalepsy for death. His supposed dead man rises up on the dissecting table and agrees to reveal the whereabouts of certain hidden money if the doctor allows him to escape from the military prison. To this the doctor agrees and numerous scenes of a rather grewsome character follow. Both the doctor and convict are blown up by the treasure box at the end and a young man and his sweetheart fall heir to the wealth. The photography lacks clearness in places.

"CAUGHT IN THE ACT" (Crystal), August 19.—Pearl captures Jim Slick, the expert safe opener, in the act of robbing her husband's safe. She chloroforms him in the dentist's chair. Belmont plays the double part of the dentist and his own patient. Fairly amusing.

"HYPNOTIZED" (Crystal), August 19.—In which one of the lovers hires a hypnotist to make his rivals act like a cat and dog. Some amusing nonsense.

"THE SUFFRAGETTE TAMES THE BANDIT" (Frontier), August 14.—A bright little comedy, containing a good humored satire on the suffrage movement. Lady Ethel is a militant suffragette from England. She converts everybody on the ranch and is stolen by bandits. She immediately goes to work on them and they offer to hand her back, without any ransom. One of the freshest comedies shown for some time and should not give offense to followers of the cause.

"THE GHOST" (Victor), August 22.—The old, familiar "haunted house" story, in a pleasing setting. Gertrude Robinson and James Kirkwood are the lovers. The latter makes a bet that he is not afraid to stay in the haunted dwelling over night. Of course, he discovers a den of thieves infesting the place, and there follows an exciting capture of the 'gang. Good photography and a brisk, stirring story.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY NO. 74" (Universal), August 6.—A number of usual interest containing scenes from the Mexican revolution, a glimpse of the navy aviation demonstration at Hempstead, the Larchmont Yacht Club races, horse show at Long Branch, and other features.

"THE BEATEN PATH" (Eclair), August 20.—This three-reel picture has many big situations in it. In the cast are some of the company's best players—Alec Francis, Julia Stuart, Barbara Tennaot, Will Sherer, O. A. C. Lund, Hector Dion, and others. The story is of a family feud between two families, the heads of which quarrel over a boundary line. The main scenes are laid about large mansions, but there are others in an atmosphere of the Northwest, in primitive surroundings. "The Beaten Path" is a real feature.

"A WOULD-BE DETECTIVE" (Gem), August 18.—A short picture of burlesque Sherlock comedy. The leading actor may have never seen Fred Mace in his old Biograph success, but his work is a most excellent imitation of the present Majestic comedian.

"THE HEART OF A JEWESS" (Victor), August 15.—A genuine story of Jewish life in two reels, enacted by Jewish characters. The character work is excellent and the production one that holds the interest throughout. The Schadchen, or match-maker, succeeds in mixing things up badly for Rebecca. Jake is lured away to get a $10,000 bribe, but when he reports for his bargain Rebecca quite properly repudiates him and ultimately finds happiness with David, foreman of the tailor shop. The atmosphere of this is perfect and the argument between the Jewish guests at the wedding quite amusing. An entertaining number.

"WHEN THE BLOOD CALLS" (Nestor), August 20.—Indians make an attack on a frontier cabin and burn it. A small boy, who happens to be absent at his father's mine, is left alone in the wilderness. The daughter of the chief finds him and he is adopted into the tribe. The story which follows (in later years), the capture of a white woman by his tribe, is queer and a bit obscure and, on that account, doesn't interest strongly, although many of the scenes are commendable.

"A MAID OF THE MOUNTAINS" (Nestor), August 18.—The old familiar story of the Southern mountains, in which the hero is suspected of being a revenue officer. He wins the girl in spite of obstacles, and induces her father to give up "moonshining." The dinner scene at the close, while perhaps characteristic, is too ridiculous to help the story much. The mother drinks out of her saucer and eats with her knife, and to cap the climax, the father removes his shoes at the table.

"WHEN CUPID WON" (Nestor), August 12.—A farce comedy along conventional lines, but lively and amusing. There are a number of characters that are well made up and act naturally. It is good natured; it doesn't drag and will make a fair offering.

"SOME RUNNER" (Nestor), August 22.—A farce, on same reel, depending on trick camera work to make it seem as though the hero of the story is "some runner." A friend has bet $10,000 on him and, to begin with, he over-sleeps. When he arrives at the start the others have gone. That doesn't bother him; he can even stop to fall in love and get married and still win the marathon. He does other moving picture stunts besides falling in love. The picture will surely make laughter.

"THE SEA URCHIN" (Powers), August 22.—One of the strongest seacoast stories we have seen. Jeanie MacPherson appears as the girl saved ten years before by the hunchback fisherman. He has grown to love her, and though her heart goes out to another, she considers herself bound to him. But later, after some powerful and stirring scenes in a boat, during which the girl falls overboard, the old man realizes that the girl is not for him. He saves her from drowning and gives her over to her lover. A memorable offering, with some vivid scenes along a picturesque coast.

"ASCENDING MOUNT BLANC" (Gaumont), August 7.—A marvelous picture of scenery and a very worth-while offering. The photographs of glacier and of cloudland are clear, sharp and beautiful and, somehow, the picture has contrived to give us a very vivid sense of reality, as though we were there ourselves. Among the special scenes are: The top of the mountain, the tossing and rolling of the clouds, as seen from a high point; the formation of a cloud behind an icy ridge, a blizzard on the heights, etc. It is no contemptible offering to the public; people will be likely to thank the exhibitor for it.

"SHOOING THE WOOER" (Gaumont), August 7.—A little flirtation comedy, very clever and pretty and full of good fun. Its quality comes mostly from the players who have been chosen with discretion and are pleasing. The lady of the General Post Office is, herself, lovely and will have a host of admirers. It was carefully made in every way and clearly photographed. A good offering.

"AN ORPHAN OF WAR" (Kaybee), August 22.—A two-reel war story. Tom's early experiences are stirring and hold the attention. His father is shot because of his sympathy for the North. The boy hides in the clothing of a scarecrow and thus escapes. Later he finds the girl and her negro mammy in the woods; good scenic effects here. Later Tom aids the girl's father on the battlefield and after the war he goes to live with them. A typical war drama with the leading parts in the hands of the Kaybee's well-known juveniles.

"A GREATER INFLUENCE" (Crystal), August 19.—The scenes in which Chester is injured while hunting are merely preliminary to the main story, and seemed too long, as it was later necessary for the story to get an entirely new start. Pearl becomes a servant girl and Chester rescues her from the unwelcome attentions of the son. The bribe of $100 per month was not very convincing, as the son's attentions were not shown to be very serious, at least from the standpoint of matrimony. A fair release.

"THE LITTLE SHIPPER" (Powers), August 20.—A film story filled with homely sentiment of an appealing sort. The old sea captain casts off his daughter because she marries without his consent. Later, after finding himself unwelcome in his son's home, he is glad when circumstances bring about a reconciliation with his daughter. He saves his grandson from drowning and leaves all his money to the boy. A good sea coast yarn.

"THE HARVEST OF FLAME" (Rex), August 21.—A two-reel offering. written and directed by Wallace Reid. He plays the role of inspector. The views of the overall factory are interesting and the story has many well-devised dramatic moments. Particularly good is the fire portion of the second film, in which the inspector rescues the heroine, Pauline Bush. We liked the roles of the father and the young cigarette-smoking employee very much. A good offering.

"IN SEARCH OF QUIET" (Imp), August 21.—A two-reel comedy drama, written by Fay Wallace. This type of story, in plot and handling, is one that is always successful with the average audience. It has tone and quality, the situations are fresh and original, and the characterizations good. Matt Moore and Jane Gail are pleasing in the leading roles. Miss Gail shows unusual animation and personal charm. The pursuit of the auto with a motorcycle was nicely done. An especially good comedy offering.

"THE RETRIBUTION OF YSOBEL" (Frontier), August 16.—The story of a disappointed lover who goes West and marries a Mexican girl. Later he accidentally meets his Eastern sweetheart in California. The jealousy of the two women brings on complications that result in the death of a greaser and the arrest of Ysobel for bigamy. There is a confusion of characters at the start and the rivalry scene is not well enough acted to get the idea over. It clears up in a little while and one is able to follow the story. The close-to-the-camera work is overdone to a frazzle. It is typical of those stories where the Eastern girl goes West, finds her former lover a cowboy, and the squaw or senorita loses out, as the case may be.

"A DROP OF BLOOD" (Solax), August 15.—A conscience play showing the torments of mind that come to those that shed human blood. A remarkably well-photographed picture of a rather conventional story, suggestive of "The Bells" and others. Some thanks should be given the producer, because the characters are not all shoved up in front of the camera all the time.

"FOUR FOOLS AND A MAID" (Solax), August 13.—An alleged comedy making use of some of the mirth provoking tricks employed many years ago in "afterpieces" at a variety show; such as, making a chair out of a man by putting a chair cover over him; making a hatrack out of another, etc., so that the next lover calling will not know they are there. Judging from Darwin Karr's dress suit, the four fools call on the girl in the evening. The clock must be going backwards, because it is afternoon when she slips out and marries another fellow. The picture ends with the four fools kicking each other in a circle. Not exactly a world-beater.

"THE GREATER LOVE" (Itala).—A picture occupying about a reel and a half and giving a clearly told and not very dramatic love story. We failed to get interested in any character in it, even the hero who commits suicide in the end. He had been shot in trying to protect his uncle (the girl's father). The doctor, loved by the girl, had pronounced him mortally wounded. The girl took pity on him (he was her cousin) and promised to marry him, if he got well. The doctor performs an operation and the youth is on the road to recovery. The ending is artificial and also unpleasant. Acted and photographed in good style, and with some beautiful scenes, the offering will be acceptable to a great many spectators.

"HIS STOMACH AND HIS HEART" (Gaumont), August 14.—If a man marries his cook in order to have her in his service for life, he may eat a hired girl's cooking. That is all the picture really shows, but in setting it forth, much that is true of human life and truly amusing is included. The bargaining with the cook to come, in the first place; the dinner table of the glutton, his wedding with the cook and many other scenes are well worth while. The photography is as usual with Gaumonts—very good. The players are clever people who know their business.

"MAGNETS" (Gaumont), August 14.—A lecture by pictures on physics. It very clearly shows the peculiarities of magnets and is very easily understood. As an offering to the public it has merit, but many people have read and know a good deal more about magnets than this shows.

"FALSELY ACCUSED" (Solax), August 8.—The story is weak, but the picture has been very well photographed and the work of the players is pleasing. It is a melodrama made up of old things that have pleased in other offerings and there will be a good many who will be entertained by it. It won't go strongly with the critical.

"THE HEAVENLY WIDOW" (Solax), August 6.—There is something in this offering that we haven't seen before nor is there much for which we can commend the author's critical taste from what he has selected. It is beautifully photographed, though, and the players deserve credit. Because of these two things, it is almost a good offering. The audience will not be dissatisfied with it, if there are one or two strong pictures on the bill. Fraunie Fraunholtz has a clever female impersonation which the story makes necessary in order to win Marian Swayne away from Darwin Karr.

"FIVE COPIES" (Great Northern), August 9.—A little office farce. The male clerk has arranged his typewriter for five copies and the female clerk types a love note at the bottom of the upper copy. Everybody in the office getting a copy thinks it is for him. The Great Northern actors have their own individuality in these comic films. We think this offering can be safely relied upon as a program lightener.

DEATH OF JOSEPH GRAYBILL.

Joseph Graybill, a well-known and popular young actor, died in New York City on Sunday, August 3, of acute spinal meningitis. He was stricken in his rooms at the Pierpont Hotel. It was a case of physical collapse accompanied by blindness, which, had he lived, would have been permanent. Funeral services were held according to the Christian Science ritual at Campbell's Chapel on West 23rd Street, on August 6, and the interment was at Greenwood Cemetery. The pallbearers were Louis Geleng, Frank A. Tichenor, Jacob Gerhardt and Arthur Leslie. The deceased leaves a mother and sister, Mrs. Chester B. Roberts, of Milwaukee. A large number of his friends attended the services, including as many of the Pathe players as could be spared.

Joe was born at Kansas City, Mo., in 1887. He was educated at St. John's Military Academy at Salina, Kan., and at the Milwaukee Academy. At the age of 18 he began his theatrical career with the Thanhouser Stock Company in Milwaukee. After one season there he came to New York and got an engagement with Henry Woodruff in "Brown of Harvard." After that he played juvenile leads and comedy parts with Henrietta Crossman and Henry E. Dixey. Later he played the part of Clay Whipple in a road production of "The Witching Hour." This part he always considered his best. Then followed a period of 44 weeks in vaudeville in support of Margaret Moffet in "Awake at the Switch." About three years ago he joined the Biograph Company and played with it in New York and California. He next joined the Lubin Company and from there went to the Imp Company. Leaving the Imp, he went South with Harold Shaw's company to play in the Jack Bonavita lion picture. On his return he played under James Kirkwood in the Victor Company.

The Late Joseph Graybill.

At the time of his being stricken he was with the Pathe Company in Jersey City. There were some scenes that had to be finished and, although nerve broken and blind, he insisted on going through the scenes, with only the director's voice to guide him. He collapsed at the end of the ordeal and died a few days later in Bellevue Hospital.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

SYRACUSE CONVENTION SUCCESSFUL.

Meeting to Reorganize New York State Branch of the League Perfects Organization—Another Meeting in October.

REPORTS from the meeting of motion picture exhibitors, held at Syracuse, N. Y., for the purpose of reorganizing the New York State Branch of the Motion Picture League of America, which was disrupted by the bolting of its delegates at the national convention in Grand Central Palace last July, indicates that a very successful convention was held and that a new branch of the league is in a fair way to be firmly established.

The meeting was held in the Yates Hotel on Monday, August 11th, and was called to order by National President M. A. Neff. About thirty exhibitors were in attendance, of whom twenty-two were entitled to vote. A delegation was expected from Binghamton, N. Y., but the Binghamton exhibitors missed their train and so sent a telegram instead, advising the convention that the Binghamton local was in full accord with the objects of the meeting and would endorse its action and support the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and its officers.

Similar action was taken by the Rochester local and a telegram was received from Utica exhibitors assuring President Neff of their loyalty to the big league.

Officers of the new New York State branch were elected as follows: W. E. Wilkinson, of Syracuse, national vice-president; A. N. Wolff, of Rochester, president; Charles P. Smith, of Syracuse, first vice-president; F. C. Pierce, of Geneva, second vice-president; F. E. Samuels, of New York, secretary; W. C. Hubbard, of Rochester, treasurer; John Mullaney, of New York, sargeant-at-arms.

A legislative committee was elected consisting of Mr. Day, of Auburn; Mr. Lux, of Utica, and H. L. Fox, of Binghamton.

Chairmen of standing committees were appointed as follows: Committee on Laws—Tobias Keppler, of New York; Committee on Grievances—F. W. Esterheld, of Rochester; Membership—G. A. Langa, of Syracuse; Publicity—E. W. Logan, of Syracuse; Constitution and By-Laws—John Mullaney, of New York. Chairmen were authorized to select members of their respective committees.

On motion the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved; That the New York State Branch No. 11, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, does hereby endorse the actions and work of the National Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America and its officers.

Resolved; That the New York State Branch No. 11 hereby recognizes the New York Local No. 1, of New York City as the legally affiliated local of New York City, designated as the Motion Picture Exhibitors Board of Trade, of New York City, Incorporated. Sidney Ascher, president; Frank E. Samuels, secretary.

After some discussion it was decided that the officers elected at this convention be considered as temporary officers and that another convention be called, to be held at Rochester, N. Y., on Wednesday and Thursday, October 15 and 16.

During the meeting an attempt was made by a number of exhibitors, headed by Samuel H. Trigger, president of the bolting state organization, to enter and take part in the proceedings, but President Neff made it plain that no exhibitor affiliated with the bolters would be permitted to attend the convention of the new branch. The insistence of the bolters became so great at one time that the hotel management was called upon to keep them out. Finding that they could do nothing toward breaking up the meeting, the bolters, numbering about thirty, of whom nineteen were from New York City, secured another room in the hotel and held a meeting of their own.

WISCONSIN BRANCH OF THE INTERNATIONAL MOTION PICTURE ASSOCIATION MEETS.

About fifty exhibitors of the state of Wisconsin met in the Colonial room of the Plankinton House in Milwaukee July 31st, for the purpose of receiving a report of its delegates to the New York convention. After hearing the report of Charles H. Phillips, national president of the International Motion Picture Association, corroborated by W. J. Sweeney, national director of the association, and other delegates to the New York convention, the action of the Wisconsin delegates was unanimously ratified, and the International Motion Picture Association of Wisconsin was immediately organized by the election of the following officers: Roy Cummings, of Madison, president; B. K. Fischer, of Milwaukee, national director; Henry Trinz, of Milwaukee, first vice-president; A. F. Baum, of Manitowoc, second vice-president; George Frellson, of Waukesha, secretary, and Frank Cooke, of Milwaukee, treasurer.

Resolutions were passed favoring a censor by the National Board of Censorship of all pictures displayed in the motion picture theaters in the state of Wisconsin; also favoring three reels for five cents. Many other important resolutions were adopted affecting the rights and interests of the motion picture exhibitors in the state of Wisconsin. A committee on constitution and by-laws was appointed for the purpose of drafting a constitution and by-laws for the Wisconsin association.

NEW EXHIBITORS' LOCAL IN NEW YORK CITY.

Under the name of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Board of Trade, the exhibitors, of the city of New York, who do not approve of the action of the New York delegates in bolting the National Convention at Grand Central Palace last July, have organized and secured articles of incorporation with the following officers and charter members:

President, Sidney Ascher; first vice-president, John Mullaney; second vice-president, F. Goldfarb; treasurer, Mr. Herring; secretary, F. E. Samuels; financial secretary, Mr. A. Levine; chairman of board of directors, Harry Jacobs; vice-chairman, Jay L. Wolf; secretary of the board, Mr. Fleischman.

The incorporation papers were signed by the following exhibitors; Sidney Ascher, R. L. Macnab, John Mullaney, F. Goldfarb, A. Levine, Harry Jacobs, Herring & Blumenthal, Jay L. Wolf, F. & G. Amusement Co., F. E. Samuels, S. Marks, J. H. Lubin, Nathan Vinegrad, Gleich & Kronacher, Tobias, Keppler and Mr. Carlos.

President Ascher appointed chairman of standing committees as follows: Mr. Carlos, temporary chairman of by-laws and permanent chairman of laws and legislation; Mr. Marks, membership; Mr. Macnab, financial; Mr. Lubin, publicity. The chairmen were permitted to select the members of their respective committees.

Through the courtesy of the management of the Imperial Hotel, 31st Street and Broadway, New York, the New York Motion Picture Exhibitors' Board of Trade, Local No. 1 of the State Branch No. 11, have secured accommodations at that hotel, which has been officially designated as Local Headquarters, and where all monthly and other meetings of the league will be held. Special accommodations for the secretary of the league has also been secured at the Imperial.

The regular monthly meeting of the local will be held at the Imperial on Monday, August 18, at 11 o'clock a.m. Members are urged to be present as there are a great number of important matters to be discussed, together with the report of the meeting held at Syracuse on August 11.

CALIFORNIA CONVENTION.

The annual state convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of California will be held at San Diego, Cal., on September 9, 10, and 11. It is expected that there will be a large attendance.

CENSORSHIP CONFERENCE UNPRODUCTIVE.

President M. A. Neff, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, held a conference, as previously announced, with the representatives of the General Film Company, the Mutual Film Corporation and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company on Thursday, August 7. The meeting took place at the Imperial Hotel, New York City, and was attended by President Neff, Attorney William Small for the General Film, and J. C. Graham for the Universal. Mutual was not represented. While the manufacturers representatives listened to Mr. Neff's explanation of the situation as he understood it, they did not consider that the problem concerned the manufacturers sufficiently to warrant them taking an active part in the proposed plans.

Attorney Small characterized the censorship proposition as un-American. Mr. Graham made some inquiries as to the status of the censorship question. No action was taken.

CALL FOR ILLINOIS CONVENTION.

A special state convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Illinois has been called by National President M. A. Neff, to take place in Peoria, Ill., on Tuesday and Wednesday, September 16 and 17. Special organizer, Clem Kerr, will be in the state several days prior to the convention. A new set of state officers will be elected to take the place of those suspended.

CALL FOR INDIANA CONVENTION.

A special convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Indiana has been called by National President M. A. Neff, to take place in Muncie, on Thursday and Friday, September 25 and 26. Special organizer, Clem Kerr, will be in the state several days prior to the convention. A new set of officers will be elected to take the place of those suspended.

KERRIGAN JOINS UNIVERSAL.

A telegram from Manager Bernstein at Los Angeles, Cal., just received, is to the effect that he has signed, J. Warren Kerrigan, formerly with the American company, for leading parts in Universal pictures. The change is to take effect immediately. Kerrigan is considered to be one of the best of players in western characters.

WELLS GETS KINEMACOLOR.

Jake Wells, the theatrical magnate of the South, has signed a contract with the Kinemacolor Company which practically gives him control of the pictures of that concern in all cities where his theaters are operated. Service will begin in Atlanta, Birmingham, Savannah, Norfolk and Richmond on August 25. Mr. Wells will open a distributing office in Atlanta to serve towns in the southeastern states.

GAUNTIER PLAYERS GO TO IRELAND.

The "Gee Gee's Will Become the "O'Gees" For a Short Season—Headquarters at Beaufort.

The Gauntier Players sailed Thursday, August 14, on the White Star Steamship Adriatic for Ireland where they will remain as long as the weather permits, making a series of three-reel Irish subjects. In the party were Miss Gene Gauntier, Mr. Jack Clark, Mr. Sidney Olcott, the director of the company, Allen Farnum, scenic artist and stage manager, Mrs. Frank T. Montgomery, wife of the Jacksonville picture magnate and three other players.

It is the intention of Mr. Olcott, Miss Gauntier and Mr. Clark to go direct to London, where additional players will be engaged, while the rest of the company will land at Queenstown and go direct to Beaufort. The scene of operations is the same occupied by Mr. Olcott's Kalem company three years ago and is familiar to most members of the Gauntier Players.

The exact nature of the subjects to be produced was not revealed but there is no doubt that a number of very interesting features will be secured. Owing to weather conditions in Ireland it is feared that the season suitable for picture making will be short, but the company will remain as long as working conditions are favorable.

Warner's Features will continue to market the product of the Gauntier Players, as in the past, for the American exhibitor. All other territory is controlled by B. Nicholls, of London, at present.

Bosworth, Incorporated

Famous Selig Player Becomes Interested in Company to Produce Jack London Pictures.

HOBART BOSWORTH, long known for the excellent work he has done with the Selig Company, has entered into a corporate agreement with H. T. Rudisill and Frank A. Garbutt for the purpose of producing pictures based upon the famous stories by Jack London. The name of the new company will be Bosworth, Incorporated, and the pictures will be marketed under the name "Bosworth." As a further identification of each London subject a twenty-foot view of Mr. London will be prefixed, typifying as nearly as possible the local color of the story.

Hobart Bosworth.

Work has already been commenced on the "Sea Wolf," one of Mr. London's best stories. Mr. Bosworth will play Wolf Larsen, that strange paradox of intellectual force and physical brutality. Mr. Herbert Rawlinson will take the part of Humphrey and Miss Viola Barry that of Maude, having been selected for their special fitness for those characters.

Mr. London's stories are favorably known all over the world and the writer needs no further introduction here. As much may be said for Mr. Bosworth, who has appeared in Selig productions for the past several years and is known in every country where American pictures are shown. Mr. Garbutt is a celebrated sportsman, popular in clubland as a yachtsman, autoist and aviator.

As a commercial proposition it is believed that the London stories in picture form will command almost instant success. As nearly as possible the pictures will be taken upon the locations of which Mr. London writes and to this and extensive preparations are being made for excursions far afield to scenes never before shown in motion pictures.

The officers of Bosworth, Incorporated, are Hobart Bosworth, president; H. T. Rudisill, secretary, and Frank A. Garbutt, treasurer.

VITAGRAPH NOTES.

The Paris branch of the Vitagraph Company is following the example of the main branch in America, by erecting one of the largest plants in Europe. It will be up-to-date in every respect with every modern improvement and every department in full relation to the other. Mr. R. A. Reader, business manager of the Vitagraph's interests in Europe, says the building of the factory will cost at least half a million; possibly more, before it is completed. His report of European conditions generally, and the extreme popularity of the Vitagraph Life Portrayals, has prompted the erection of larger facilities to meet the increasing demand for their productions.

The Vitagraph player, George Cooper, who will be remembered in "The Mills of the Gods," "The Drop of Blood," and some of the Lambert Chase Series, produced at the Eastern Vitagraph studio, recently went to Santa Monica to join the Vitagraph Western Company. On his way he stopped at a hotel in Los Angeles, for a day or two. While there, some professional gentleman alert for business opportunities, entered his room and pried open his trunk, helping himself to George's gold watch and still further pursued his investigation into the possessions of another guest, from whom he stole several stick pins, and a watch fob. The professional prowler took his departure without leaving his name and address; therefore, his whereabouts is still a mystery. George reached his destination on time and is now working hard in western productions with the determination to secure another watch with a burglar-proof attachment.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"THE HARVEST OF FLAMES" (Rex).

This subject is one that will be most favorably received in view of the present investigation of safety appliances in factories and the proposed legislation to remedy hazardous conditions.

The factory owner is given notice that his premises will be inspected as to safety appliances and compliance with the fire regulations. Knowing that his factory is painfully deficient, he endeavors to bribe the young inspector when he calls upon his daughter Pauline.

The inspector refuses the bribe and the next day advises the factory owner that his factory is being operated in violation to the city fire laws and demands that hazardous conditions be remedied. The factory owner incensed at his action forces his daughter to return her engagement ring to the inspector. He accepts the ultimatum and leaves.

Scene from "The Harvest of Flames" (Rex).

The foreman of the factory is an inveterate cigarette smoker. As the owner passes through the finishing room the foreman tosses a lit match aside and conceals the cigarette. The factory owner leaves Pauline in tears in his office and goes to his bank. In the meantime the match has started a fire amongst the scraps of inflamable material on the floor. The foreman attempts to crush out the blaze but it has gained too much headway.

Returning to the factory the owner sees the building in flames and the foreman rushing toward the fire alarm box. The owner is horror stricken for his daughter is not among those who have escaped. She is trapped in his office behind a wall of flames. The inspector arrives upon the scene and learning of Pauline's danger rushes toward the building. The flames drive him back. Rushing to a rear exit he looks up and sees Pauline silhouetted in the window against the roaring flames. She has managed to throw out a rope but is too frightened to attempt the descent. The inspector saves her and her father consents to their marriage. The foreman realizing the enormity of his act eschews the further use of cigarettes and the factory owner has learned a lesson in the fruitlessness of greed for gold.

DECLARES REGULAR DIVIDEND.

The New York Motion Picture Company has declared a third monthly dividend of one per cent. upon its capital stock, payable on August 15, 1913, to all stockholders of record on August 11, 1913.

"MISTAKEN IDENTITY" (Great Northern).

There is much genuine amusement incorporated in this comedy and at the same time it teaches a lesson calculated to drive away suspicion from the minds of doubting wives. Mr. Smith is a sedate lawyer and at the urging of three of his friends goes out on a little bathing expedition and Smith fails to notify his wife. She is suspicious of him and engages the services of a woman detective to trail him and report his movements. Smith and his pals are having the time of their lives and, in the meantime, the detective in petticoats is on his trail. The latter has been furnished with an accurate description of his wearing apparel and this fact leads to many strange and amusing adventures. While Smith is enjoying a dip in the ocean, a seedy and hardup individual enters the dressing room and appropriates the raiment of the young lawyer. Incidentally there is a considerable sum of money in the coat and this proves a great temptation to the intruder. He rushes to his best girl, clad in his new raiment and invites her out to a swell cafe, where he proceeds to spend the money that he has found in Smith's pocketbook. All the while the female detective is on the trail of the man who is wearing the latter's clothes and she becomes convinced that he is Smith. When the interloper is sufficiently intoxicated, the lady detective piles him into a taxi and carries him to Smith's home. Smith in the meantime has borrowed new clothes and when he arrives at his domicile he is surprised to find there a stranger clad in the suit that had been stolen from the bathing pavilion. There is an exciting scene between husband and wife and the former leads the intruder to the garden gate, where he forgives him for having appropriated his clothing and returns to the family home to hear his wife vow that never again will she become suspicious of her husband's fidelity. The comedy is acted in spirited fashion.

Scene from "Mistaken Identity" (Great Northern).

WONDER CLOCK—NEW WRINKLE.

The General Sales Company of America, located at Pittsburgh, Pa., is offering a new device for picture theaters in what is called the Wonder Clock. The purpose of this clock is to acquaint the patrons of your theater of the time of day, or night. Every manager knows how difficult it is to place an ordinary clock, so that it can be plainly seen from all parts of the auditorium. By attaching the Wonder Clock to any lighting fixture a stereopticon effect is obtained at a point plainly visible to any one in the audience and it does not interfere with the picture. See the advertisement on another page and write to the agents for particulars, not forgetting to mention the Moving Picture World.

"THE REFORMED OUTLAW" (Lubin).

This is a Lubin melodrama of the western type, and a veritable love romance. The locale is picturesque and the story extremely clean and exciting. The picture was taken in New Mexico and the characters true types of border life. The stellar role is played by Romaine Fielding and worthy of the best efforts of that very intense actor.

Gentlemen Jack, an outlaw, with a big heart, but for years buried in his trade, holding up a stage, meets "the girl." He deserts his fellow bandits and becomes a hermit. Ten years later accidentally he again meets the girl of his dreams in the city. An unknown power draws them together, despite the fact that Mary is married. A traitor tries to deliver Jack to the hands of justice, but he escapes and returns to the life of a wood chopper. Later, one day, he sees his sweetheart and her husband riding through the woods. As a joke he determines to hold them up as of yore. Mary recognizes him and introduces him to her husband. It breaks Jack's heart and he determines to again become a "Knight of the Road," but as he is buckling on his guns the vision of Mary appears to him, he drops his irons on the ground, takes up his axe and, muttering to himself, "Gee that was a close shave, God bless her," goes to the woods and a labor of love.

Scene from "The Reformed Outlaw" (Lubin).

AMERICAN ACTOR VICTIM OF BOY BANDITS.

It was no make-believe hold-up that was experienced last night by L. J. Marcet, an actor with the American Film Company's "Flying A" troupe. Marcet, who had been seeing a lady friend home, was returning about 11:30 o'clock, when he was accosted by two boys, one of whom held a revolver while the other went through his pockets.

Marcet, it seems, had left his purse at home, and had just one stray dime in his clothes. This the juvenile bandits found and then permitted their victim to go on, with the usual instruction about looking back.

Railroad Policeman, Wm. Beck, seeing the boys as they ran along the track, took them in custody when he found they were armed. At that time it was not known at the station that the boys had just conducted a hold-up, but later on, when confronted by Marcet, they admitted their connection with the robbery. Their only excuse was, "we needed the money."

They also said that they are runaways from the George Junior Republic near Los Angeles. They gave the names of Raymond and Harry Brown, but are not brothers. Their revolver was a 32 calibre cheap affair.

MUTUAL GETS "SAPHO" AND "MOTHS."

The Mutual Film Corporation announce their first special release features to succeed "The Battle of Gettysburg." One is "Sapho," on which Florence Roberts has been working at the Brooklyn Heights (Los Angeles), studio of the Majestic. It is in five reels. The other is "Moths," which Maude Fealy produced in the Thanhouser plant at New Rochelle. This is in four reels. In the case of both features the particular studio making it merely acted for the Mutual in the production of the film. First in Miss Roberts' support is Shelly Hull, a Broadway favorite, and first in Miss Fealy's is William Russell of Thanhouser fame.

MISS ELLEN AGGERHOLM.

One of the latest additions to the Great Northern acting forces is Ellen Aggerholm, a talented young actress who has won fame for herself along the lines of versatility. She has played many important parts in her profession and is regarded in Europe as one of the most winsome, as well as the most talented young women graduated from the stage to the realm of moving pictures. Her father is a prominent artist in Norway and the Great Northern Company is having prepared a splendid one sheet poster of the young woman in a characteristic pose. To see it will be to admire it and patrons of the Great Northern are assured that it will prove an innovation along the lines of lobby display.

UNIVERSAL GLOBE TROTTERS.

Equipped with letters of introduction from William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, addressed to all the diplomatic and consular officers throughout the world, and a personal letter from Mayor William J. Gaynor, Carl Von Hoffman, the Universal cameraman, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Lee, left for England on the Steamer Minnetonka, August 2nd.

Von Hoffman and his party, who will be known as the Universal Travelers, will circle the globe in an automobile which has been especially equipped for the purpose. Many important cities will be visited by the Universal travelers and they will take scenic views of especial splendor and interesting close-up studies of civic conditions in every metropolitan city visited.

The contemplated tour includes a visit to London and the British Isles, France, Germany, Switzerland, The Balkans, Italy, Spain, Africa and Australia. Von Hoffman does not expect to return to the home of the Universal for two and a half years. During this period, all pictures taken en route will be released through the Universal programme.

"LES MISERABLES" OPENS IN FRISCO.

On Sunday afternoon, August 10, an invitation exhibition of the great "Les Miserables" marked the opening of its run at the Cort Theater, San Francisco. Expensive engraved invitations were sent by Manager W. W. Hodkinson to a select list of citizens, including ministers, teachers, public officials, journalists and moving picture enthusiasts. Every preparation had been made to make the opening an auspicious event for the elite of the city. By a liberal use of the excellent line of special lithographs and scholarly heralds, the interest of the San Francisco public has been worked to a high pitch, and news is expected soon of the triumph there of this great film masterpiece which surely deserves all the good things that have been said about it.

"THE WAR CORRESPONDENTS" (Itala—Danmark).

Here are some of the many big scenes in the Itala-Danmark four-reeler, "The War Correspondents." They are sufficient in themselves to emphatically herald its worth. A railroad bridge is blown up by one of the contending forces in the Balkans and a railroad train plunges through the orifice and down into the river beneath. An aeroplane, scouting near the enemy's camps, is destroyed by a well directed shot from a high-power field gun. A theater is demolished and set on fire by a shell fired from a high powered gun shot from a distance of a mile. The hero foils his rival and prevents him from sending his story of the battle to the rival's paper by setting fire to a telegraph pole and putting the wires out of order when the pole crashes earthward. A dance in the Sultan's harem is disturbed by the attack of the invading armies. The hero slips over a precipice and is rescued at a great risk by the heroine. An automobile runs the gauntlet of a heavy cannonading and is finally struck and smashed by a shell, its occupants fleeing for their lives. A gigantic battleship is sunk by a submerged mine. The heroine jumps off a fast moving train and rolls down a steep embankment.

Scene from "The War Correspondents" (Itala).

Here are a succession of events, interspersed between exciting happenings of major and minor importance that combine to make a feature of incessant action. It is conjectural whether so much action was ever compressed into four reels of film.

ECLAIR HAPPENINGS OF THE LAST WEEK.

Jack Johnston returned from his flying trip to "Old Ireland" and got back into harness at the studio by smashing $300 worth of fixtures in a realistic saloon brawl. If you want to see how artistically he did the job, put "one of the Rabble" in your notebook—it's a September release.

Little Clara Horton, the Eclair Kid, is mighty glad she has but one birthday to celebrate in a year. The "Happy Family" gave Clara a really-truly party last week at the studio, with nine bright pink candles on a bright pink cake. Nine plates were laid, for nine happy kiddies, who played nine bully games that the "Happy Family" had arranged beforehand. Then Clara took her nine little presents, and heaps of big presents home, and—sad to relate—at nine o'clock that night, she had—well, ice cream and water melon don't always agree. Clara had an unexpected vacation for several days.

Helen Marten and Milly Bright are spending all their spare time in practicing swimming stunts, for a thriller that will be filmed shortly, in which the girls will have to put over business that would be worthy of the lissome Annette Kellerman and sinuous Odiva combined. Helen and Milly approve of the Ostend one-piece style bathing suits, but refuse to say whether they will wear that kind in the picture.

Alec B. Francis hunted all over Jersey and then invaded New York the other day, to find six brand new kittens to feature in a coming Eclair picture. Finally he got them, from an accommodating woman, but he had to take the mother cat back to the studio with the kittens. Imagine dignified Alec's trip across the ferry and out to Fort Lee.

Miss Julia Stuart is a 33d degree "fan." The only way to get her to work during baseball season, is to keep an up-to-the-minute score card posted in the studio for her benefit.

In "The Thirst for Gold," Will E. Sheerer was Convict 220, who is pronounced dead by the military surgeon, otherwise kindly Fred Truesdell. But Fred is strong for realism in the film. After he pronounces Convict 220 dead, he is carried into another room for dissection, but comes out of a coma and makes his escape with the greedy surgeon's connivance, on promise of sharing the stolen gold he had hidden. Well, things went all right during rehearsals, but Bill did not like the looks of Doc Fred Truesdell's shiny dissecting knives. When the crank began to turn, Fred sprang forward to carve him up so earnestly, that as the cold steel tickled Bill's ribs, he jumped up with a suddenness that threw the surprised Fred entirely out of the picture. After explanations, and a mutual understanding between the supposed corpse and carver, the picture went on. Bill only wanted to make sure that Fred was not nursing a slight grudge against him.

EXCLUSIVE MAKING DEALS.

Contract for the handling of the feature product of the Itala, Solax, Great Northern and Gaumont companies has been arranged between Mr. Joseph R. Miles representing the Exclusive Supply Corporation and J. C. Corwin, acting for the newly organized Big Four Film Co., of Dallas, Texas. The Headquarters of the Big Four Company will be in the Praetorian Building. The contract will cover a period of sixteen weeks.

Mr. Corwin who is a capitalist and the possessor of large commercial interests in the Southwest purposes putting "big business" methods into operation. His theories and practices of efficiency in the feature renting operations are expected to stimulate business. The best experienced feature men have been engaged. When this Dallas office is firmly established, Mr. Corwin expects to open branch offices in other territories.

Klondike gold in big nuggets brought by new exchange blood will probably enter the film industry. Sidney Firestone, of New York City, representing a syndicate of men who struck ore is in negotiation with Joseph Miles, manager of the Exclusive Supply Corporation, for the handling of its feature program in the south. Widely known managers of exchanges have been asked to join the new company and are reported to be optimistic about the prospects of the Exclusive program there. Simultaneously with the opening of this office, another would be opened in New York.

Herman Rifkin, representing the Eastern Feature Film Company, of Boston, is, with his associates, considering the Exclusive proposal for New England. W. E. Greene, of Boston, with whom a number of the Exclusive's companies are now doing business, was also in New York last week. His presence indicates Yankee shrewdness in not wanting to be missing when the plums begin to fall.

Lawrence Smith, of Chattanooga, Tenn., also contemplates opening southern offices. H. Schwalbe, of Philadelphia, G. A. Edwards, president of the Electric Theater Advertising Company, of Dayton, Ohio and W. H. Rudolph, of the same city, both have designs on Exclusive rights in their home state.

WARREN, TAYLOR AND LEONARD WITH WARNERS.

Giles R. Warren, widely known as a writer and editor of motion picture scenarios; S. E. V. Taylor, equally well known as a director, and Miss Marion Leonard, most favorably known as a picture star, have joined the producing forces now being assembled by the Warners Features, Inc. Mr. Taylor and Miss Leonard will operate in studio in Brooklyn and will make three reel features. Mr. Warren, in conjunction with J. A. Whitman, will operate at a studio at Cliffeside, N. J., assembling a new company for the production of three reel feature subjects.

DR. PRENTICE BUILDING ANOTHER THEATER.

The second moving picture theater to be opened by Dr. W. V. Prentice, of Toledo, Ohio, within the past three years, will be known as the Lyric, and will be situated on Broadway. Dr. Prentice expects to have the house ready for business on or about September 1. When finished it will have involved an expenditure of $25,000. It will accommodate seven hundred people and will have all the latest improvements. The dimensions are 40 feet by 150 feet. A large stage will be provided for, although the Broadway Amusement Company, operators of the theater, do not intend to feature stage productions of any kind.

"JACK MEETS HIS WATERLOO" (American).

A novel farce drama written by J. Warren Kerrigan, in which the author plays the leading role as a western favorite in a ranch town. A bevy of country maidens vie with one another for favors with the handsome young deputy sheriff, which appointment he received shortly after his arrival as a guest of his father's friend, the local sheriff. Sallie Newman, a ranchman's daughter, returns from school and holds herself aloof from any attentions. Bill Acres, her old sweetheart, receives but scant courtesies and he taunts handsome deputy sheriff about the one girl in town he dare not kiss. Jack goes after the game in a manner that arouses the animosity of Bill and lays the foundation for a feud that bids fair to result fatally to a number of participants. By the shrewdness of jack, the plot is thwarted and the perpetrator landed in the toils. Some excellent comedy touches are added in the evolution of the story and the whole presents a very pleasing offering.

Scene from "Jack Meets His Waterloo" (American).

FRESH AIR ON TAP.

New Electrical Device Purifies Stuffy Air and Makes It Fresh.

Duplicating nature's processes on a large scale for human comfort is the dream of scientific men. Their latest accomplishment is an electrical machine for purifying the air by producing ozone.

Everyone is familiar with the peculiar freshness of the air after a thunderstorm. This was found to be due to the ozone produced by the lightning flash. Wherever the air is fresh and exhilarating it is found that there is free ozone present, in the open country, near large waterfalls and forests. The reason is that ozone is a very active, concentrated form of oxygen, so active that it virtually burns up organic impurities and germs, removes odors by oxidizing the substances that cause them, and revitalizes the air with fresh oxygen.

In crowded places there is seldom any ozone in the air, because any produced by the lightning or wafted in from the open country is immediately used up in destroying all it can of the emanations from the crowd, not to speak of the smoke, and other impurities in the air. That is why air in a crowded place seems lifeless and stuffy.

The Westinghouse electrical ozonizer produces ozone in the same way that lightning produces it naturally, but the static discharges are invisible and not noisy because they are small and entirely within a protecting case. Besides, it produces it in such quantity that even the air in a crowded hall can be kept fresh and pure by just connecting the machine to the electric light socket. These machines are in use in many moving picture theaters, and their effect is really remarkable. Patrons of such places say that the air inside the theaters is really fresher than the air outside.

To just look at these remarkable machines no one would believe they could produce the effect they do. Each is a small cylindrical affair less than eighteen inches high. Inside are the transformer and the specially prepared tubes that cause the electric current to change a part of the air into ozone. They make no noise and there is no moving machinery in them, just a constant brush discharge similar to the discharge of a static machine.

These ozonizers are built by the Westinghouse Electric and Mfg. Co., East Pittsburgh, Pa.

EDMONDSON ESTABLISHES AMERICAN BRANCH.

Richard Edmondson, after completing arrangements with the Exclusive Supply Corporation for the handling of the products of the Film Releases of America, the company of which Mr. Edmondson is the active head, sailed on the steamship Imperator for Europe on August 9th.

While in America, Mr. Edmondson established an office on the 6th floor of the Candler Building in which his special representative, Albert B. Ladick will be in charge. The first release of the new company will be "Doctor Nicholson and the Blue Diamond." As soon as this is well launched many more features will follow.

Mr. Richard Edmondson.

Mr. Edmondson is widely known in England and on the continent as well as in America. He began his experience in the film business in California about nine years ago as an exhibitor, since which time he has operated a chain of theaters and exchanges. He is now going in heavily for the exclusive handling of manufacturers' features. He controls a number of brands made in Germany, France, Italy, Austria and Scandinavia. His London office is No. 19 Cecil Court. The company's title is the American Film Releases. Special representative Ladick has for the past fifteen years been in the cotton business. He is an alumnus of Williams College.

MOVING PICTURE FANS FORM AMERICAN CLUB.

In a personal letter, addressed to Miss Vivian Rich, leading lady of the "Flying A" Stock Company, is contained the advise that the enthusiastic girls of Frankfort, Indiana, have organized a social club known as the "American Club." The writer of the letter, Miss Pauline E. Shaffer, adds "and never a play is featured by the American Film Mfg. Co. that we do not see."

The crystalized enthusiasm of these ardent American fans will undoubtedly yield incalculable good by the wholesome stimulation rendered the natural development of the mental faculties.

ANOTHER "ONE ROUND" COMING.

Although twice knocked out, One Round O'Brien has not yet ended his ring career. Fred Mace wires a friend that he has finished another One Round O'Brien story that is one of the best things he has done for Majestic. It is called "One Round O'Brien's Flirtation" and introduces Mrs. O'Brien, who has not figured in the earlier plays.

CORRESPONDENCE

LOUISVILLE.

THE Louisville Photo-Play Association, comprising a membership which controls about thirty-five of the leading picture-play houses in Louisville, has passed a resolution making a very generous offer to the Made-in-Louisville Association, which is preparing to stage a display of Louisville products in the shop windows in the central part of the city during the last week in August. The exhibitors have tendered, free of charge, the use of slides to advertise the exposition in their theaters, the space being valued at about $750 for the period for which it will be used. The resolution to this effect was passed by the Association at its recent meeting, just two minutes after a letter had been read from the Made-in-Louisville Association asking its support, which, doubtless, was hardly expected to take such substantial form. Another interesting feature of the Made-in-Louisville Exposition, from the standpoint of the moving picture men, will be the recording in films of a parade which will close the display. It is also proposed to take moving pictures of several representative manufacturing plants in the city, and to exhibit these films all over the country, thus giving the city some splendid advertising.

Local films have become very popular in Louisville during the past few months, B. F. Keith's Theater featuring them regularly. Ernest Carpenter, manager of the Novelty, recently took a trick picture on Fourth avenue, which proved very popular, as most people pass along that busy thoroughfare frequently, and it is well known that people like to see in pictures what they have seen in actuality The picture showed two well-known citizens passing along the street, while other pedestrians, automobiles and other vehicles dashed past them at a tremendous speed. Another local film recently shown, depicted the fire department making a run.

A Louisville photographer, Kerwin Caufield by name, has started a very nice little business, which, incidentally, is of considerable value to local exhibitors in advertising coming features. He takes photographs of the posters illustrating the films, and makes slides from his photographs, coloring them appropriately. These slides are used by exhibitors at the moderate charge of 25 cents each, and are passed from house to house in exactly the same manner as the film.

M. Swito, of the Crystal Theater, in Louisville, is one of the three stockholders of the recently-organized Swito Amusement Company, which is busily engaged in acquiring a string of moving picture houses extending from Indianapolis to Louisville. The company recently completed a beautiful little house in French Lick, Ind., which has already been found too small, seating only 300 people. It is also building a house at Martinsville, Ind., and has an option on property at Mt. Vernon, Ind., where a theater will probably be built. Two operating houses have been acquired in Indianapolis, Ind., and the company is considering the purchase, at Shelbyville, Ind., of the house now owned by F. J. Rembush, the mirror screen man, in that territory. One of the largest purchases was that of the opera house at Madison, Ind., which will be converted into a moving picture theater and vaudeville house. The company is now building a $50,000 house in New Albany, Ind., which will be the third in the Swito string in that city. The building will contain a number of office rooms, and a feature which is sure to be popular will be the roof garden.

Daniel Fuller, of Salem, Ind., is one of the latest additions to the ranks of the exhibitors in the Hoosier State. He has purchased the opera house in that city, and will operate it as a combination vaudeville and photoplay house. Three reels and two vaudeville acts will constitute the program, which will be shown only at night, at ten cents.

The formal opening of the Gem Theater, the Simmons house, at Monticello, Ky., held recently, was highly successful, several leading citizens making addresses and commending the show to the audience as clean and moral, and in every way entitled to their support. The talk of Rev. M. D. Early, the Baptist minister at Monticello, was to this effect, and was especially noteworthy, coming from that source.

The Clifton, the East End photoplay house operated in Louisville by Robert H. Lucas and J. Johnson Mussleman, is one of the best and most prosperous of the suburban houses, due largely to the energy and advertising ability of the owners. Special advertising stunts, such as wagons plastered with bills, and driven by uniformed Boy Scouts, band concerts, and the like, have served to keep attendance at the Clifton good all through the hot weather. The house maintains its own billing plant, and covers that end of the city pretty thoroughly, using the paper which comes with the films as well as a considerable amount of stock paper. Mr. Musselman is himself a vaudeville actor of considerable ability, and puts on an act at the Clifton every three weeks, showing at other houses in the interim.

The Lawrenceburg Opera House, of Lawrenceburg, Ky., has become the Pastime Theater, Manager Preston Grubbs considering that name somewhat more appropriate since he converted the house into a high class photoplay theater. The house is receiving good patronage, and Manager Grubbs intends to keep his attendance increasing by a careful selection of his pictures.

The New Hippodrome Theater, at Lexington, Ky., is well under construction on the site of the old house, which was for so long known to the Lexington public as the Hippodrome, and the proprietors hope to be able to have the opening during the latter part of September, if everything goes well. The house will be one of the handsomest in the Bluegrass, and will seat over a thousand persons. The upholstering will be in russet leather, and the decoration scheme will be in red and white, shading from the crushed raspberry of the carpets into the white and gold finish of the dome. An indirect lighting system will be used, as in most modern theater buildings. The house will show the best of vaudeville and moving picture attractions.

A string of 60 and 100-watt Tungstens, running from the Hotel Madison, the leading hostelry of Madisonville, Ky., to the Garrick Theater, the leading photoplay house in that city, brilliantly illuminates the street at night, and serves to point the way unmistakeably to the popular playhouse, thereby stimulating attendance to a marked degree. This plan was the idea of Manager Bleich, of the Garrick, and he is getting gratifying results from it.

The Lillian, a new moving picture house, was opened recently in Clarksville, Tenn., under the ownership of Joe Goldberg. The building is a new one, constructed for the purpose, and cost about $30,000. It has a marble front, and is provided with a splendid hydraulic pipe organ. The theater is said to be one of the handsomest and most up-to-date in the State.

A prominent organ manufacturing concern of Louisville is building up a rather impressive business in pipe organs for moving picture houses, although, of course, its original business was principally with churches and religious institutions generally. Recent sales to photoplay houses were to the Odeon, of Birmingham, Ala.; the Queen Theater, of Galveston, Tex.; the Tivoli, of Beaumont, Tex., and the Hippodrome, of Dallas Tex. Many other instruments have been sold to moving picture theaters, those enumerated being recent sales.

The new Princess Theater, at Owensboro, Ky., has opened for business, with a full four-reel daily program. It is provided with an orchestrion equal to an orchestra of fourteen pieces, playing all the latest music, and with complete new equipment in a new building, the new enterprise starts off under very favorable auspices. The Owensboro papers gave the Princess a very good send-off, and as it pays to advertise, this undoubtedly helped a good deal.

At Paducah, Ky., Manager Desberger, of the Gem, the Arcade and the Star, his trio of live picture show houses, has offered to his patrons a proposition which is taking remarkably well, in the shape of a "three-in-one" offer, selling admission to all three houses under one ticket, at a reduced price. With a ticket to these three houses, Paducah people find that they can spend an entire evening at the picture theater at the minimum of expense, and many of them are taking advantage of the innovation.

Another highly successful house at Paducah, Ky., is the Arcade, whose roof garden show is making a hit with those whose principal concern is to get where they can court the night breezes. The plan is to run the reels in the theater during the afternoons, with shade and fans to make it as cool as possible, and at night the show is given on the roof, where, elevated above the sidewalks, the utmost possible degree of comfort can be had. With this innovation, and the triple attraction referred to above, Paducah people are well provided with entertainment for the summer.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE park board in Minneapolis may permit a moving picture show at the Lake Harriet roof garden beginning after the close of the regular concert season, on August 16, and to continue until after the state fair.

Joseph Sharpney and Emmet Race, of Missoula, Mont., have purchased the Lyric moving picture show in Lewiston, Idaho, and have taken possession. The house will use Mutual service. Race will have charge of the orchestra.

Assistant State Fire Marshal Samuel Robinson ordered five moving picture managers in Albion, Mich., to make repairs or close their houses.

The Saxe Brothers, of Milwaukee, Wis., donated 10,000 tickets to the Saxe Kinemacolor Theater for the benefit of the Milwaukee Journal's Free-Ice-for-Babies' fund, which meant a contribution of $1,000 to the fund. Large blocks of the tickets were sold to stores, which permitted their employees to attend the treat.

The theater license commission of LaCrosse, Wis., has issued an order, requiring patent door fasteners on every theater door exit in the city. These fasteners are so arranged that any force against the door from within will release the lock and throw the exit open. The commission has been formally organized, with Chief of Police J. B. Webber as chairman. The other members of the commission are the fire chief and health commissioner. The body passes upon all applications for theater licenses and regulates the sanitary and safety feature of the houses.

The moving picture men of Lansing, Mich., have announced that they will appeal to the common council for a vote by the people upon the subject of closing the theaters on Sunday. They say that a few years ago they decided to close, but remained open upon protests from the working people.

The International Bible Students Association, which closed its convention at Madison, Wis., July 6, passed a resolution endorsing the use of motion pictures as a means of Bible instruction for all classes of people. The adoption was unanimous. Announcement was made that "the association has prepared motion picture films costing thousands of dollars from Genesis to Revelations, making a connected story so that persons not able to read or write may get a working knowledge of the Bible. It is said by those who have seen the pictures that the whole performance of six hours will give every man more knowledge of the Bible in six hours than he could get with twenty-five years of the average man's study of the Bible. All of the pictures from Creations to Restitutions are arranged in consecutive order. It is the purpose of the association to give the public an opportunity of viewing these pictures without any cost in the various cities of Europe, Africa and North and South America. This association has representatives in every country in the world and as the organization is already established, the work of showing these pictures is greatly facilitated."

The Union Pacific Railroad is using 15,000 feet of "safety first" motion pictures, which were recently taken at Cheyenne, Wyo. The pictures show how railroad accidents occur and how they can be prevented.

Moving picture men of Missoula, Mont., appeared before the city council and protested against a carnival company which made serious inroads upon their business. They charge that the carnival company, which had about forty shows, paid only regular theater license and that the company permitted gambling and indecent attractions.

The new Colonial Theater at Fourth avenue and Pike street, Seattle, Wash., was opened July 16. The house will play pictures.

Moving picture theaters of Madison, Wis., may remain open on Sunday without fear of arrest if pictures are of a religious or moral uplift nature are shown, and a percentage of the receipts given to a charitable organization. This was the opinion of Judge John C. Fehland of the Municipal Court.

David A. Wright, a traveling salesman of St. Louis, is suing William Saxe, owner of the Lyric Theater, S. L. Rothapfel, manager, and Harry M. Safford, a policeman, for $5,000 damages in the United States District Court. Wright charges he bought a seat in the Lyric March 17, 1913, and when he desired to sit downstairs, where there were vacant seats, he was ordered upstairs by the manager. He refused to go and the policeman was called and removed him. Wright alleges this false imprisonment. Manager Rothapfel asserts that there were no seats downstairs and that Wright refused to go to the balcony and insisted on standing in the aisle downstairs.

According to the building inspector at Milwaukee, Wis., only five moving picture shows will be refused a license August 1, under the new ordinance recently passed.

Somers & Pacius, owners of the Princess Theater at Prosser, Wash., have leased the old State Bank Building in that city, and will remodel it into a picture show.

Business men of Medford, Oregon, contemplate having the Chief John Indian wars of Southern Oregon filmed. Two militia companies have volunteered their services.

The work of the Parents' Educational Bureau, which was originated and developed by the mothers of Oregon, will be filmed. This was decided at a luncheon given by the Oregon Congress of Mothers and Parent Teacher Associations to the delegates attending the World's Christian Citizenship Conference in Portland, Ore. The pictures will show physical examinations of babies.

The editor of the "Democrat," at Madison, Wis., has taken up the cudgel for the Sunday picture show. He says: "Mighty little worth while is gained by applying Sunday closing to moving picture shows. It is a radical and intemperate proceeding and a community as enlightened as this should be ashamed of its course. The whole Sunday closing movement is being carried to an absurd length. It is a movement that will not stand the test of public judgment. The playhouses are as legitimate a recourse of a Sunday as swimming in the lakes, motoring in the country, picnicking on the back lawn, or as any other diversion of entire purity and innocence."

The exhibition of the "James Boys in Missouri" at the Princess Theater, at Helena, Mont., was stopped by the chief of police.

ILLINOIS.

FRANK ETHRIDGE and D. J. Kimmel, of Decatur, have leased the Otloe Theater at Pana, and assumed charge. Ethridge has had experience in the moving picture business.

Scott's Theater, at Jacksonville, gave a free exhibition of an anti-tuberculosis film when Miss Harriet Fulmer, secretary of the state extension work, told of the efforts being made to interest the public in the prevention of the spread of the white plague. A number of moving picture men in the state have been co-operated with the anti-tuberculosis society, and are enabling it to do more efficient work.

The village of Hume is without a band, so the merchants have united, and each Saturday evening during the months of July and August, give three reels of pictures free on the streets. It is said this form of entertainment has attracted larger crowds than the band concerts.

John H. McNamara, of St. Paul, Minn., who owns the Majestic Theater, at Freeport, is having the building enlarged and remodeled.

The new Crescent Theater in the 1400 block, East William Street, was opened July 23. All children under 14 years old, who live in a given territory, were admitted free to the production of "Beauty and the Beast."

Six & Yockey have sold their moving picture show at Perry, to Guy Dorbin and Herman Thiele.

When the citizens of DeKalb gave a big picnic, the Star Theater and the Haish Auditorium threw their doors wide open and no admission was charged to the many visitors in town.

D. Udell, of Paxton, has leased the Smith Opera House at Fisher for six months, and will give shows every Thursday and Saturday night. Udell owns and operates the Crystal Theater at Paxton and the Nell Theater at Campaign.

An airdome has been opened in Princeton.

Glenn Reynolds is opening a new moving picture show in DeKalb.

The city council of LaHarpe has taken a step toward regulating the picture—not the class of pictures but the length of shows. For the first four reels a night a license of $25 a year must be paid and each additional reel a license of $25 is asked. Such municipal interference would be welcome to a number of the larger cities, where six and seven-reel shows are being given for five cents.

Articles of incorporation have been filed with the County Recorder at Quincy for a new theater at Liberty. The incorporators are: T. Leslie Brasbory, W. W. Feilds and George W. Wilson, all of Springfield.

Winfred W. Van Osdel, of Aurora, has secured a camera and will take films in the vicinity of Aurora.

Free moving pictures were among the attractions for the two booster days conducted by the business men of Atlanta, August 5 and 6.

Merchants of Atkinson are using free moving pictures to attract the farmers to town on Saturday nights.

Louis Frick, of Albion, has purchased a moving picture show at Newton.

Gene Dagle has purchased the Star Theater at Murphysboro.

The W. R. Markle Floating Theater, which travels the Illinois, Mississippi, Ohio Monongahela and tributary rivers, has added the talking pictures to its program. The showboats of the western rivers, which at first used the photoplays merely as "chasers," are giving films a more prominent place on their programs.

C. M. Young, of Chicago, has taken charge of the Coliseum, at Paxton, which will be operated as a moving picture house. R. B. Coddington is the owner.

The Muncie Amusement Company is being formed by business men of Muncie. They will erect a new business block and theater building.

M. A. Leary has purchased the half interest of Miss Dora Kelly, of Dreamland Theater, on N. Main Street, in Carlinville. His partner is A. E. Oswald. Leary is truant officer, and has an opportunity to solve the problem of pupils playing "hookey," in order to attend moving picture shows.

Tampico business men have combined photoplays in their Wednesday night entertainment to the people of the surrounding territory.

J. H. Petrea, of Watseka, has opened the Gem Theater, at Milford.

An example of consistency was shown at Zion City, when Wilbur Glenn Voliva, whose force raided Burt M. Rice's picture show on Saturday, not only allowed moving pictures to be taken of a procession of his tabernacle on Sunday, but directed the work of the cameramen. The Zion city council passed an ordinance prohibiting the conduct of picture shows in the city, and in addition adopted a resolution revoking Rice's license. The fight was rather strenuous. In defiance of the mayor's actions, Rice opened his theater. The local police appeared and arrested Rice. Jesse Owen, son of Alderman Owen, assumed charge of the theater and began to show pictures. The policemen returned and arrested him. No sooner had Owen left, than E. R. Christianson, until recently city clerk, went into the operating room, and after friends had locked the door, began showing more pictures. The policemen secured an axe and broke in the door and Christianson was taken to the station.

The May Amusement Company, of Chicago, has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are: T. W. May, Paul O'Donnell and Charles Weinfeld.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

MOVING pictures that can be viewed by the swimmers at the bathing beach is one of the attractions recently installed in Walnut Grove Park, Wichita, Kan., by Manager O. A. Boyle. Three reels are given nightly.

D. A. White has purchased the Cozy Theater at Hobart, Okla., from J. L. Ransom.

The Waco Hippodrome Company, of Waco, Tex., has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $70,000, to erect a large moving picture house. T. P. Finnegan, of Dallas, is president; D. M. Wood, of Waco, president, and E. Rotan, treasurer. I. L. Sanger and C. H. Lang, of Dallas, are directors.

T. C. Macty will build a new moving picture theater in Dewitt, Ark.

The Elk Photoplay Company, of San Antonio, Tex., has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $20,000. The incorporators are: T. E. Whaley, C. H. Bodeker and S. Daube.

The Board of Censorship of Fort Worth, Tex., plans to co-operate with the exhibitors of that city in doing away with the standing in aisles, and with obstructing the sidewalks with sign boards and displays. This action is merely advisory upon the part of the board, but they believe that there will be no friction with the photoplay managers.

An enterprising drug company in Fort Worth, Tex., is boosting the picture game by announcing in its advertisements that "All moving picture shows, etc., are subject to insects and germs. Use 'Kill 'em Quick.' "

The Southern Traction Company has proposed to install in Cameron Park, at Waco, Tex., a moving picture machine, and will furnish pictures free to the children who visit the pleasure resort.

Dallas, Tex., moving picture show men are having trouble as the result of an order by Commissioner Baylock, to eliminate electric pianos from the theaters. The Dallas News does not think that enough business is attracted by the music to justify the cost of the player.

Albert Warren is preparing to erect a new opera house in Aransas Pass, Tex.

The St. Louis Motion Picture Company took 2,000 feet of film of the Albuquerque-Santa Fe road race at Santa Fe, New Mex. One of the pictures show the cars climbing four switchbacks without a change of scene.

The Baptist assembly of Arkansas is taking kindly to the moving pictures. W. P. Wilson, host of the assembly, which was held at Arkadelphia, Ark., July 17 to 23, has a camera and planned to make films of the boat races, swimming races, tennis matches, etc.; and also to use a number of the Baptist notables in pictures with semi-plots. These pictures will be shown throughout the state among members of the Baptist denomination and will also go with the next special train sent out to adverise the products of Arkansas.

The Texas National Guard was recently filmed at Camp Mabry, near Austin, and will prove a good attraction throughout the state.

The Nevada National Feature Film Company has been incorporated at Reno, Nev., for the purpose of taking pictures in that state of historical events. Among the subjects which will be handled are: The Mountain Meadow massacre, the Donner party, Horace Greeley's stage coach ride, General Fremont's pioneer trail and also typical pictures of farming and mining in Nevada.

The Attorney General of Oklahoma has decided that there is no state or county license tax against moving picture shows. This is located by municipal ordinance.

The Men's Club of the Euclid Avenue Methodist Church of Topeka, Kan., has found the moving picture machine a good substitute for ice cream at the lawn socials. The first entertainment drew 1,000 persons to the church lawn.

A delegation of merchants appeared before Mayor Jost and Superintendent of Buildings Hamilton, of Kansas City, Mo., to protest against picture shows between Eighth and Twelfth, and from Main to McGee streets. They contended the photoplay houses promote high and unreasonable rents and an impairment to trade. The mayor advised them that nothing could be done unless a new ordinance is drafted.

Rev. Kennet Brown, pastor of the Presbyterian church of El Paso, Tex., has secured a moving picture machine and photoplays will be featured at each Sunday evening service.

The Alamo Motion Picture Company, of San Antonio, Tex., has been incorporated with a capital stock of $50,000. The incorporators are: S. C. Christal, W. A. Bunnell, Dick Collins, A. D. Rogers, all of Decatur.

MICHIGAN.

DEPUTY STATE FIRE INSPECTOR A. E. MAYNARD, declared, "Kalamazoo moving picture houses are in the best condition of any in the state."

The state of Michigan and the city of Grand Rapids have clashed in their regulation of picture shows. The Grand Rapids city ordinance provides that exit lights shall be with red letters on a black ground, while the state law provides for white letters on a red ground. Deputy State Fire Marshal Shafer, on his inspection, ordered this change at the Apollo. The local authorities did not believe it was necessary, and proprietor F. D. Nichols was advised that if the theater was satisfactory to the local fire department, the changes need not be made. It is probable that the matter will be carried into the courts.

Insurance Commissioner John T. Winship, of Michigan, who is also ex-fire marshal, is urging theater managers to study the new state law. He says that any opera house, regular theater or academy of music that books, or contemplate making bookings of pictures as a part or whole of a program, comes under the Vaudette law. This law requires the inspection and licensing of the operating room and a certain standard of seating arrangement. This hits many societies which give travelogues.

IOWA.

MANAGER G. E. HIGHTOWER, of the Royal moving picture theater, in Des Moines, has had a little trouble with the negro question. E. H. London, a negro justice of the peace, is said to have entered the Royal, but refused to sit in the section allotted to colored persons. After he had been asked to change his seat and repeatedly refused, he was ejected. He alleged he was kicked, and had Hightower arrested, charged with assault. The jury was out two minutes and returned a verdict of "not guilty."

Frank Dutton will open a picture show at Blanchard.

W. H. Englert, manager of the Englert Theater, at Iowa City, which was run as a vaudeville house last year, is reported to be considering a plan to switch over to pictures. The last year was not a good one, it is reported, and bookings will be doubly hard for the smaller houses this season.

Some Iowa towns appreciate moving pictures. Elrod Dayton, who is traveling with a tent show, ran up against a case of this kind at Delta. They not only gave him a free license, but a bonus of $25 for his week's performance.

Paul Hart is building a new moving picture theater at DeWitt.

H. Meple is building a new moving picture theater on Sycamore street, in Davenport.

Mens Peterson, former proprietor of the Casino, has purchased the Colonial from Paul D. Hart at Clinton.

Brown & Anderson, managers of the Princess Theater at Boone, have dispensed with vaudeville for the rest of the summer and are playing feature pictures.

PHILADELPHIA.

ALBERT M. GREENFIELD has sold to a syndicate, headed by James J. Springer, the Imperial Theater, now in course of construction on the East Side of Sixtieth street South of Walnut. The property was sold for a nominal consideration, with mortgages of $72,500. The theater occupies a lot 76 x 180 feet, and has a lobby 32 x 75 feet. With its seating capacity of 2,000, it is one of the largest one-floor theaters in the city.

W. T. Jones recently returned from an extended tour, making industrial films for several of the large manufacturers in the East. The pictures are being finished by the Independent Film Company of No. 233 North Eighth street.

The Pierce Poster Company has in contemplation the erection of a large building, to be used by film exchange and allied trade members only. This building is to be situated on Vine street, between Broad and Thirteenth streets, and will be of the modern concrete fireproof style, with floors 54 by 85 feet. Feature and other film exchanges will now have an opportunity of being housed under one roof, for the convenience of the exhibitors.

Ben Seligman, formerly of the Caniso Theater, on Market street, is now manager of Lubin's Auditorium, Eighth street, above Race.

The North American Film Corporation, of New York, will open a Philadelphia branch office about September 1, and expects to release four three-reel features and four commercials every week. J. Madison, of the International Film Company, will be the manager of the new office.

The office of the Jumbo Amusement Company, located at Girard avenue and Front street, was robbed of $100, the days' receipts, by an employe, who, up to the present time, has evaded arrest.

Commissioner Jackson, of the State Department of Labor, has been given an opinion by Deputy Attorney general Hargest, that he has the right to prohibit the employment of children under fourteen years of age in moving picture establishments. The question arose when a deputy factory inspector dismissed a number of children employed in such places in Philadelphia.

BUFFALO.

JOHN R. OISHEI, manager of the Teck Theater and the Shubert interests in Buffalo, will build a modern fireproof brick building for a moving-picture theater at 418 Auburn avenue, North of Baynes street, this city.

Michael Shea, who has featured moving pictures at his Buffalo vaudeville theater for many years, has been spending a six weeks' vacation at his summer home at Manhattan Beach. He visited New York City occasionally during that period to book acts for his Buffalo house.

Police Superintendent Michael Regan, of Buffalo, is suggesting to the managers of the moving picture theaters here, the separation of the men and the women in the audience as a means of checking flirtations. According to printed reports, some of the managers are said to be in accord with the idea and intend to see that it is carried into effect. Men accompanied by their wives, or young men escorts of girls, would not be subject to the rule.

Manager Laughlin, of the Majestic Theater, Buffalo, is offering "Quo Vadis?" in moving pictures during August. This is billed extensively as "The New York City Astor Theater success in eight reels, with pipe organ accompaniment." The performance lasts two and a half hours.

Manager Harold Edell has installed a beautiful foundation in the lobby of the Strand moving picture theater.

Manager Marcus, of the Academy Theater, has been featuring "Quo Vadis?" in moving pictures, with a ten-act vaudeville bill.

The members of the Bible Students' Conference, in Toronto, Ont., recently considered the advissbility of moving pictures as a maens of heralding the Gospel and imparting religious instruction.

It is reported here that the U. S. Army recruiting office in Buffalo, may use moving pictures as a means of obtaining new men for the army. Major Richard C. Croxton, commander of recruiting in the Hudson Valley District and New York City, is the originator of the idea of using the moving picture. Should his plan be adopted, he intends taking the pictures at the different posts throughout the country and not from scenes and troops picked especially for the occasion. In this way it is believed, a great many desertions will be prevented, for the men will not be enlisted under false impressions.

George W. Verbeck is president and general manager of the Buffalo Feature Film Corporation, which has just opened an office at 17 West Swan Street. The concern was formerly located in the Mutual Life Building. Mr. Verbeck went into the moving picture business last year. As head of the Independent Vaudeville Co., he has conducted the Verbeck Circuit for six years. He formerly built and managed the Oil City, Pa., Opera House.

D. J. Savage, assistant manager of the Buffalo branch of the General Film Co., has returned from him vacation at Detroit and Mt. Clemens. J. A. Schuchert is manager of the branch, which is one of the best equipped film exchanges in New York State. The films are kept in metal boxes enclosed in steel cabinets. The examining room is strictly fireproof and is equipped with ten individual booths. Each booth has a marble slab for a rewind table. The floors are of concrete.

Fred Ullman & Co., have broken ground for a large moving picture house at Elmwood avenue and Utica street. The theater will have a capacity of 1,200. The General Film Company's service will be used.

S. Jacobson will open a moving picture theater at Abbott road and Bailey avenue about September 1st.

Max L. Levine has been issued a permit to operate a moving picture theater at 345 Elk street, Buffalo. He had to resort to the courts and secure a peremptory writ of mandamus to get the permit.

The Buffalo Councilman have voted to permit the building of a moving picture house at 1437 Jefferson street. The petition, which was put in by Gottfried Strasser, was favored by Sheriff Becker and City Treasurer John Reimann, who said the people in the district wanted the theater. The plan was opposed by Attorney E. W. McIntyre.

Buffalonians have been informed that if the underwriters do not veto the project, twelve of the biggest trans-Atlantic liners may soon provide their passengers with the moving pictures.

Manager A. R. Sherry is using a beautiful white taxicab to advertise the New Lyric Theater, which features vaudeville and moving pictures. The chauffeur wears a white uniform, in keeping with those of the New Lyric ushers. Attractive advertising of the house and performances appears on the car, which makes frequent trips about town. Hundreds of Buffalonians have expressed the opinion that the auto is an effective, dignified way to draw customers to the theater.

John E. Roth, of Buffalo, is having a good trade in his moving picture house at Niagara Falls.

Mme. Marie von Unschuld, court pianist to her majesty, the Queen of Roumania, is spending the summer at Chautauqua. She believes moving pictures are very effective for the teaching of music. She said: "Children, and in fact anyone, can be taught music right at home, and they do not need to have a private instructor. The moving picture has been used for most everything, and it is finding a new field as a music teacher. The day is not far distant when every home will have a screen to teach the children music. We can educate people in music by mail as well as we can teach them French or any other subject, and perhaps even better, because we will be aided by the moving picture machine.

George Kleine's production of "Quo Vadis?" is attracting great crowds daily to the Majestic Theater. Pipe organ music, provided by Manager Laughlin adds to the impressiveness of the shows.

BILLY BISON.

IN THE MIDDLE WEST.

THE St. Louis "Times" is publishing a coupon, which, with fifty cents, entitles the holder to a book containing nine ten-cent admission tickets, good at the following theaters: The Aubert, Bonits, California, Penrose and Princess.

City Attorney Len Walker, of Springfield, Mo., has prepared an ordinance which provides a board of censorship with police power and authority to suppress any moving picture film or vaudeville show that is subversive of public morals. The board is to be composed of five men and five women, a majority of whom shall view, each day, every film to be shown in the city. A small fee is levied upon each theater.

Health Officer Schwartz, of Salem, Ohio, has announced that managers of moving picture theaters will be required to burn disinfectants at the close of each evening performance, and to scrub the floors with a sterilizing liquid.

The Phoenix, at LaPorte, Ind., has discontinued vaudeville three days a week and substituted Kinemacolor pictures. The Princess has also changed its program and devotes three days a week to vaudeville and three to pictures.

The Municipal & Commercial Film Company, of Indianapolis, recently took twelve hundred feet of films at New Castle. They were exhibited at the Grand in New Castle.

Manager Tritch, of Alhambra Theater, at Canton, Ohio, recently admitted to the Saturday matinee all children with clean faces and hands at a bargain price of three cents.

The Union Pacific Railroad Moving Picture Car recently left Council Bluffs, Iowa, for a tour over the entire system. Pictures taken recently at Omaha, by the bureau of safety, will be featured. Employes at all the principal towns, cities and division points, will be instructed by means of educational reels, a stop of a week made at each point.

In an advance notice of his report, Building Inspector Allen, of Cleveland, Ohio, says that the moving picture theaters of that city are in better shape than ever in their history. Investigations made a few mooths ago, showed 2,300 violations of city ordinances.

George Lowe has sold the Arc moving picture show at Monticello, Ind., to L. G. Gustavel.

Lou Mayor and W. J. Eastin have opened an airdome at Kearney, Mo.

CINCINNATI.

THE introduction of moving pictures into the amusements at the Cincinnati Zoological Gardens has met with much success. The screen is so arranged that persons on the clubhouse veranda have an unobstructed view of the pictures, which are shown each evening, previous to the band concert.

The new plan adopted by the Grand Opera House has met with much success. Previously the charge of admission was five and ten cents, and pictures changed every other day. The change has been to a price of admission to five cents for any seat in the house and pictures changed every day.

Even though this city is in the throes of a campaign for a new city charter and ways and means are being sought by political parties toward bringing forth candidates at the coming fall municipal election, the editor of the "Times-Star," an afternoon publication, found time to pound out a double column editorial, lauding the moving picture theaters for their latest innovation, that of attempting to find a girl, who, it is believed, has been kidnapped.

The Auditorium in the Odd Fellow's Temple, which for the past few years has been given over to moving pictures, is to be abandoned as a playhouse. The space formerly set aside for "the silent players" is to be made into a dance hall.

The Brown Amusement Company opened its latest addition in the local picture field in the new Norland Theater, situated on North Vine Street, and pronounced by critics as being the most complete and latest endeavor along moving picture theater lines in the Middle West. Every known convenience and safety appliance for the benefit of the public has been installed, including waiting and reception rooms for the ladies. A $10,000 one-man orchestra, the latest type of this wonderful musical appliance, has also been installed. Hundreds of persons are being turned away daily.

"Moving picture machines and stereopticons used in moving picture houses will be classified as power, placed on a separate meter, and billed as per power schedules," was the gist of an advertisement in Cincinnati newspapers last week. The advertisement was addressed to moving picture operators, and stated that at the request of the Electric Company, the Public Service Commission of Ohio has approved the change.

Cincinnatians read with much delight an occurrence which took place in Huntington, W. Va. The story has to deal with a public wedding, held in a moving picture show in that city. M. M. Thornburg, 50, has taken unto himself a third wife, namely Miss Minnie Moreland. Upon the conclusion of the ceremony, Thornburg was bustled into a waiting pushcart. "Which do you choose, beer or water?" he was asked. "I'll take the water," responded the groom. The crowd, 200 strong, rushed the cart to the Ohio River and plunged him into a deep hole. Taking him from the river, they led him back to the streets and were prepared to administer further punishment when the police interfered. The story met with much enthusiasm here because of the fact that Cincinnatians had stormed a bride and groom with rice recently at Coney Island, where they were publicly wedded in an aeroplane, while they were being pictured on film, which was exhibited at a local house.

The movement started in this city by the local branch of the Central W. C. T. U. looking toward a censorship of songs in moving picture shows and elsewhere, took on a national aspect when the complaining committee composed of Mrs. Alma K. Wilson and Miss Susan Rennick, called on M. A. Neff, president of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America. Their visit to the offices of Mr. Neff were not without avail. Mr. Neff listened attentively to their argument and was greatly interested, going into the details with the women callers on more than one occasion and seeking to learn more about the move they have made along censorship lines. He told the visitors that he was heartily in sympathy with the movement and that the public was more to blame than the owners of such picture houses where suggestive songs are sung. He based this opinion on the fact that in the majority of cases, where such songs are sung, the patrons have requested of the managements that they be sung. The women again made a determined effort to get to Mayor Hunt for his opinion on the subject, but were again disappointed at the Mayor's absence from the city. They have been promised that the city's chief executive will undoubtedly see them the first week in August.

NEW ENGLAND.

SINCE Gordon's Family Theater, at Worcester, Mass., has reopened, it presents an appearance that is distinctly better than of old. In the rebuilding of this house, no expense has been spared, and the many improvements that have been added make it one of the finest places of amusement in New England, offering motion pictures. The management has contracted for Universal Film Service, through the Boston offices, and the theater opened with "Robinson Crusoe" as its feature, to really capacity trade. Gordon's Theater is now in a position to compete for the Worcester business, and there is every reason to expect it will do very well indeed.

Mr. P. J. Enright, the popular and able owner of the Oriental Theater, Roxbury, Mass., is just now without a theater, as he was forced to close his house on account of the expiration of his lease. Mr. Enright tells us, however, that he has no idea of leaving this business, but is now searching for a suitable location to open a new Oriental. Mr. Enright always gave good programs, which resulted in good trade, summer and winter.

Clinton, Mass., is soon to have a first class theater, to be devoted to exhibitions of photoplays, as Mr. Jasper has secured a lease on a building there, where a theater is being erected. The new house will be modern and up-to-date in every way, with a seating capacity of about 500. The house is now well along, and should have its opening on August 15. There is plenty of room in Clinton for an electric theater, and Mr. Jasper feels very sure that he has a really good proposition.

Mr. "Mike" R. Sheedy and Mr. John Cooney, who opened the new Union Square Theater, Pittsfield, Mass., recently, report that their programs are evidently just what Pittsfield people were looking for, and that business has plenty of "punch." The Union Square is devoted to the policy of motion pictures and vaudeville. Due to the fact that Mr. Sheedy has extensive vaudeville connections, the acts at the Union Square are much better than is the usual thing at combination houses. The house is a first class one in every way, and all indications point to success. Mr. Sheedy is one of the best known of New England's moving picture and vaudeville men, having been identified with this business for years.

The New England Universal Film Exchange, of which Mr. J. A. Eslow is the highly efficient manager, has leased the entire premises at 1100 Boylston street, Boston, and will move its business offices, repair and supply departments from 228 Tremont street, to this new location, as soon as alterations can be made, which will be quite extensive, as the property is now a private house. This building adjoins, on the East, the Walker-Gordon Building, which is already occupied by the film department of the Universal. This new move will again put all departments practically under one roof, and will be of the greatest convenience to the host of New England exhibitors who swear by the Universal program. Mr. Eslow has only recently taken over the management of the Universal's New England business, but "J. A." is one of those men with real executive ability. No sooner is anything decided upon that will make for a more smoothly running machine (which means increased satisfaction to exhibitors), than Mr. Eslow has the proposed improvements installed. Mr. Eslow knows his business with thoroughness.

On July 12, Waterbury, Conn., became the proud possessor of a really high class theater, devoted to the policy of motion pictures. Mr. Benjamin Hansdorf, owner of this house, called the Star, tells us that his business is all that could be really expected, and that capacity houses are by no means unusual. The Star seats about 1,000 people, and has all modern improvements, including a mirror-screen. Mr. Hansdorf built the Star to last for years, and no expense was spared. The house is fireproof, and has a very good location on Baldwin street. Mr. Hansdorf will not use vaudeville, at least for the present, but the highest quality of motion pictures and illustrated songs seems to turn the trick.

Inspector Cobb, of moving picture theaters situated in the vicinity of Boston, has just been selected to fill another and more prominent position for the city. This news came as a welcome, and at the same time, regrettable fact, as Mr. Cobb was a great favorite with motion picture folks, due to the utterly impartial and courteous way he treated everyone. Mighty few men in Mr. Cobb's position are so fair and above-board, and he has the sincere good wishes of all the trade in his new position. The man to succeed Mr. Cobb has not yet been selected.

Mr. Hugh O'Neill, the well known manager of the Star Theater, Boston, has a story to tell about projection in his house. It seems that for quite a long period of time, the light on the Star's pictures was rather poor. The proprietors grumbled to Mr. O'Nell, who, in turn, talked with the operators. The latter could find nothing wrong, even after a thorough search. The machines—Power's—were in good shape. Last week, Mr. O'Nelll had the light cut off from eleven P. M. to 4 A. M., and during this period the feed wires outside in the street, were repaired. These wires, it was discovered, were literally falling to pieces, but after the repairs the light was found to be increased at least twenty per cent

Mr. Crosby Thompson, manager of the Premier Theater, Boston, owned by the Automatic Vaudeville Company, of New York, has resigned, but is still directing that house. It seems that Mr. N. N. Brooks, a member of the Automatic Company, and in charge of its Boston houses, thought much of Mr. Thompson's ability, and simply refused to consider the resignation, except as a joke. Mr. Brooks' attitude proves him a clever business man, as Mr. Thompson is not only able and efficient, but also a prince of good fellows.

Mr. "Mike" O'Brien, of the Scenic Temple Theater, Boston, and his associates, are fast making a name for themselves in this section. The Scenco Film Company, is the idea of Mr. O'Brien's, and makes a specialty of filming local events of general interest. Mr. O'Brien now tells us that Watertown, Mass., looks very hungry to him for really good photoplays, and on the 20th of August will open a theater there. Mr. O'Brien is level-headed and it is believed that this new proposition of his will prove itself to be a winner.

Exhibitors in the smaller New England towns, are trying a new advertising stunt, and with considerable success, if reports are to be believed. Slides are made, from the photographs of steady patrons, and thrown on the screen, while the music plays "Lest Old Acquaintance Be Forgot." This idea seems to promote a personal, friendly feeling between the exhibitor and his trade, which, of course, is extremely satisfactory, from a box-office standpoint.

They say that Boston is the only city in the world, where the authorities demand all films to be passed by the National Board of Censorship. Chief License Clerk Casey is a man of decided convictions on this point, and is insistent that every film be "passed."

The New Milford Opera House, Milford, Mass., is now completed and will be open the latter part of August. The new house is modern and fireproof in every respect. It has a seating capacity of well over 1,000, and every modern convenience for the comfort of its patrons, has been arranged. The Milford Opera House cost at least $75,000, and probably a little more than this figure. Milford, which is a live manufacturing town, has been without a good theater since the Music Hall was destroyed by fire, almost two years ago. The city has a population of about 50,000 people from which to draw. Manager C. W. Currier has been placed in charge of the new house, which will run vaudeville and pictures, and also some road shows.

Allston, Mass., is having a new theater being built, to seat 800 persons. Having proven to Manager Walsh, who now operates a small moving picture theater in Allston, that they will support a good show, the people of Allston will reap the benefit in the shape of a modern photoplay house, built in the best manner. Mr. Walsh, for a number of years, was publicity man for the Boston Theater, Boston, where he "made good."

Mr. J. H. Kimball, who recently contracted for five reels of Mutual service, with three changes each week, for the Art Theater of Orange, Mass., states that he is greatly pleased with his service, which suits his patrons well. The Art Theater is owned by the Eastern Theaters Company, whose main offices are at 18 Tremont street, Boston. All houses owned by this corporation are doing fairly well, the season of the year considered.

Is Kinemacolor popular at Greenfield, Mass.? Ask that question of Lawler Brothers, and you will receive a most emphatic, "Yes."

At Lakewood Park, Milford, Conn., Mr. J. J. O'Neill, the manager, is having a very busy season. Moving pictures form a most prominent part of the entertainment, and are doing their share to make things move.

On August 25, Mr. J. F. Clancy, of the Dominion Theater, Ottawa, Canada, will open his house for the season, but not with stock company attractions. This type of entertainment had been in force this spring, but the results did not justify its continuance. Moving pictures and vaudeville are to be offered hereafter. Just now a few needed alterations and general improvements are being made.

The New Portland Theater, Portland, Me., is doing a good business these hot days with its programs of feature pictures. Mr. J. A. McConville, the manager, is constantly on the job to keep things moving over the summer.

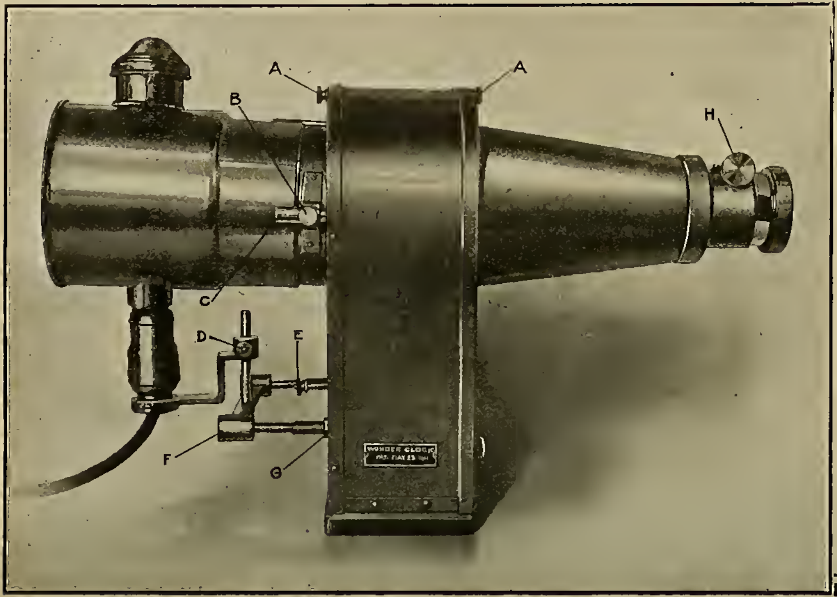
Harness the clock! Add a new, absolutely unique and startling money-maker, and a sure-as-fate crowd-puller. Imagine a tremendous clock on your wall or ceiling, with hands seemingly suspended in air, keeping absolutely correct time all the time, while an announcement flares forth from the dial's center.

Be an innovator, not an imitator. Now is the time to take a

WONDER CLOCK

It occupies very little space—hangs on electric light fixture, and throws stereopticon clock face anywhere you want it. It takes power from ordinary socket. Amazes and amuses audience and always shows correct time. Requires winding only once a week.



Use the space on the dial for announcing features, or sell it to local advertisers and make a handsome profit

Many theatres make the Wonder Clock their best advertising novelty, while others make it bring a rich profit. Doesn't interfere with pictures; spreads no light over house and only illuminates exact space occupied by the phantom time-piece.

LICENSED FILM STORIES

VITAGRAPH.

WHEN GLASSES ARE NOT GLASSES (August 25).—An amusing story of the manner in which a bilious suitor tries to deceive his future wife as to his habits is told. Some glasses of whiskey are left on his bureau before he goes to call on the widow, with whom he is having dinner. He sends a boy to fetch his eyeglasses, which he has forgotten, but tells him just "glasses." The youngster comes back with the whiskey glasses, getting the poor man into sad trouble. His engagement ring is returned to him and he is told several original and surprising facts about himself. Everybody has a good laugh at the undoing of Thompson, who gets no more than he deserves.

WHICH WAY DID HE GO! (August 27).—Pa is henpecked. Ma domineers over her daughter, Betty, and scorns Jim, Betty's choice, but approves of Paul, a fat, sporty individual. Pa promises to help Jim elope with Betty. The elopement comes off all right, but pa gets caught on a nail while going down the ladder with his daughter's suitcase. With ma at the window above and Paul's vicious bulldogs waiting for him at the foot of the ladder, pa is in a quandary. The interesting problem, the solution of which is left to the imagination, is, "Which way will he go?"

HE FELL IN LOVE WITH HIS MOTHER-IN-LAW (August 28).—That the way to a man's heart is by means of his appetite, is strikingly shown. Mother-in-law comes to visit the newly wedded couple and finds the young man somewhat discontented. It is no wonder, for his wife is so engrossed in her "art," although only an amateur, that she forgets all about cooking dinner and such like trivialities. Her mother shows her the error of her ways and son-in-law becomes very fond of her. Wifey's jealousy is aroused and she shows that she can cook just as well. Having restored harmony to the household, mother-in-law returns home, leaving nothing but happy memories behind her.

QUAINT SINGAPORE (August 28).—An unusually interesting travelogues, showing the peculiar buildings of this wonderful city, and the strange manners and customs of the multitude of Malays, Hindus and Chinese that form its population.

THE CLOWN AND THE PRIMA DONNA (August 29).—The story is told of a beautiful Italian singer in a wandering troupe in Italy. A too persistent lover kills her father, who quarrels with him when he forces his embraces on his daughter. Afterwards the girl becomes famous and goes to America, where she becomes the leading singer of an opera company. There she meets her former suitor, who again conspires against her, this time aiding a rival prima donna who is jealous of the new favorite. He tries to poison her in a cup of wine which she drinks during the performance, but her life is saved by a former clown with the wandering players, who has acted as her guardian during the many trials of her life.

THE CALL (Special—2 parts—August 30).—Lucile has married Ed Wilson, but still continues to receive visits from Tom Hughes, a former suitor and friend of her husband, who works in the same office with him. Tom generally announces his arrival by a yodeling call outside the house, and is always given an enthusiastic welcome by both husband and wife.

Estrangement results between Ed and Lucile when she sees Tom getting along in the office better than her husband. Ed becomes discouraged and takes to drink, and is finally discharged from the office. Tom suggests to him that the right thing to do would be for him to drop out of Lucile's life and give her a chance for happiness with another man.

Late one night, Ed leaves the house and starts for the West. Chance, in the form of a railroad accident, favors him, and he is able to lose his identity by changing clothes and papers with an unrecognizable victim. Tom identifies the papers and the dead man is buried as Ed Wilson.

Two years later Lucile marries Tom. Ed, meanwhile, has assumed the name of "Bill Stanton," and is making good as a forester in the great Northwest. Within a few years he becomes enormously wealthy, and one day, by chance, he meets a clerk from his former office. He hears of Lucile's marriage to Tom and is told also that Tom had so neglected and ill-treated her that she had died, suspicion pointing to Tom as her murderer, though nothing could be proven against him.

Ed resolves to be revenged on Tom and starts toward the city, sending word that he is coming. His letters become more and more frequent until the thirteenth announces that he is in the city. By means of the call which Tom has formerly used when calling at his house, Ed reduces Tom to a state of absolute terror. He finally enters Tom's house and the final act of his vengeance is accomplished. In the struggle between the two men Ed is shot and dies a few moments after his victim.

EDISON.

A MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING (August 25).—John Smith, while leaving his club, carelessly jostles a table at which two men are playing cards for high stakes. As he leaves the club, a bill, blown from the same table, falls at his feet. The bill is instantly missed and the man who jostled the table immediately suspected. Smith is found with the money in his hands and immediately rushed to the police station. He is tried and convicted.

To Henry Langdon, a clergyman, who visits him in his cell, Smith protests his innocence. He gives Langdon a written statement of the true facts and begs him to help him in getting a new trial. Langdon, on the point of going West, is unable to help him, but wishes Smith every success in his attempt and leaves, profoundly struck by the prisoner's odd handwriting.

A little later Smith is given a new trial and exonerated. Wishing to avoid the notoriety attached to his arrest and imprisonment, he changes his name to Ward, and going West, becomes cashier of a bank in a growing Western city. Soon after his arrival he discovers that Langdon is rector of a church in his new home. To Langdon, Smith seems vaguely familiar, but he is unable to place him. Admiring Smith immensely, the clergyman welcomes his attentions to the beautiful Miss Langdon, his sister, and finally marries the couple himself.

When his new brother-in-law signs the marriage registery. Langdon immediately recognizes the peculiar handwriting. He is horrified for a moment, and then realizing that Smith has started life anew, decides to keep his discovery a secret. A few days afterwards the niece of the president visits the bank and hangs her parasol beside Smith as he is counting a number of bills. One of the bills falls from the desk into the parasol. The balance is taken to the bank, the loss is discovered, and once again Smith falls under grave suspicion. To Langdon, who enters at this time, there seems to be no doubt that the man must be guilty, but he keeps silent for his sister's sake. Just as he is about to be dragged off to jail, the president's niece opens her parasol and the mystery is explained. The happy Smith gives his no less joyful brother-in-law the printed record of his acquittal on the former charge, and everything ends as it should.

A MISTAKE IN JUDGMENT (August 26).—Bobbie played with his little sister and she began to cry, nobody would believe it wasn't his fault; if he played ball in the yard, his mother said he was a nuisance and made him stop; when he wanted to go fishing they made him stay home and meet fussy old people he didn't like; and when he acted sullenly and broke things because of his great shyness before those same fussy old people, they sent him out of the room in disgrace. Bobbie stood the nagging and scolding as long as he could, and then ran away. He did not run very far because he found what he was looking for within a couple of miles of his home. A tired farmer's wife was only too glad to humor the lad with wistful eyes who wanted to play with her children. So Bobbie played with them to his heart's content, and had a glorious time.

Bobbie's mother and father, off on an automobile ride, were greatly touched by the sight of a lad playing with a number of smaller children. "Why can't our Bobbie be like that?" they asked each other sorrowfully, and then—then these blind parents saw—not that it was Bobbie, but that it was another boy they had never suspected was their son. To their credit, be it said, that they realized how wrong their attitude had been, and that they made a fervent resolution to enter into a more sympathetic understanding with their son.

QUAINT SPOTS IN CAIRO, EGYPT (August 7).—Cairo is essentially a Mohammedan city. The majority of the inhabitants live and dress after the traditional manner of the followers of the prophet. Side by side with them, however, live thousands who have adopted the customs of the modern European. The resultant contrast is very curious. The pictures of Mohammedan city life are most interesting. Suggestive views are shown of the commercial life of the city.

The oddities of native life are emphasized by pictures of their wedding and funeral processions. For the bride and groom a perilous affair slung between two camels seems to be the accepted mode of conveyance, whereas the dead man, encased in a rough box, is carried through the streets by his friends on a litter. Typically Oriental are the pictures of the pilgrims returning from Mecca, each one wearing the green hat and rejoicing in the title Hajji, which denotes that they have obeyed Mohamet's command. Then there is the Muezzin, who twice daily comes forth on the balcony above the mosque and reminds the faithful in a high, quavering voice, that prayer is better than sleep, and that Mohamet is the only prophet of Allah.

ZEB'S MUSICAL CAREER (August 27).—Zeb had lived all his life in Sprucetown, and was utterly untainted by any knowledge of the rest of this wicked world. But Zeb's wild, untramelled soul sought utterance in the divine realm of music. Zeb practiced on the trombone. When a billposter came to town and began posting announcements of the coming visit of an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" company, Zeb hailed him as a fellow servitor of the arts. With a descriptive announcement sheet of the "glittering galaxy of talent," soon to "grace the boards" of his native town firmly clenched in his hand, Zeb reclined against a hay-stack and mused on the future glories he would win with his trombone. In a short time he fell asleep.

It seemed to Zeb that in some unexplicable manner he had become a member of the "glittering galaxy of talent." Up the street came the stately parade with Zeb at its head, blowing fiery music on his instrument. And after that there was the exhilarating scene in the village Opera House, wherein the world's greatest trombone player played a thrilling solo to the accompaniment of tremendous applause on the part of the entire audience. But alas for mortal greatness! At the very climax of Zeb's success, when he was playing sad, symbolic music to heighten the dramatic pitch of the exciting play, the stage caught fire. Water was hastily thrown on the blazing boards and Zeb awoke to find himself soaked through by a gentle summer shower which had come up unexpectedly as he slept.

JOYCE OF THE NORTH WOODS (Special—2 parts—August 29).—John Dale sacrificed his good name, his liberty and the girl he loved to save his younger brother Philip from disgrace. Philip not man enough to refuse the noble sacrifice, married Ruth Cranston the girl his brother had loved, and became a wealthy and respectable citizen during the five years John was in state prison. John released from jail, assumed the name of Gaston and plunging into the Maine woods began his life anew. With illusions, faith, love—everything, shattered and ruined, the friendship which he formed with Joyce Birkdale was far removed from anything approaching the sentimental. His feeling for her was rather that of a father than a lover. He worshipped her glowing youth and innocence with the same abstraction of motive with which he worshipped the spring winds or the rising sun. To Jude Lazoon, Joyce's accepted suitor, however, the platonic nature of Gaston's attitude was by no means apparent. He fiercely resented Gaston's familiarity with his affianced bride, and bitterly upbraided Joyce for allowing it.

After their marriage the situation did not improve. Gaston, accompanying Jude to his home one day, grew a little too warm in his sympathy for Joyce while the husband supposedly slept. Jude waited until Gaston left and then fiercely charged his wife with infidelity, and striking her across the face, drove her from his door. Joyce fled to Gaston for protection, while Jude attempted to arouse the resentment of the woodsmen against the man he claimed had ruined his home. Realizing that his affection had changed to love, Gaston left Joyce and plunged into the woods. Gaston's old sweetheart, Ruth, widowed by Philip Dale's death, coming into the woods with her aunt and brother, met Joyce. Joyce, recognizing her place in Gaston's life from a photograph she had found, and thinking that Gaston must still love Ruth, prepared to leave them together. At this point she received a letter telling her that Gaston was seriously hurt, actually a trick on the part of Jude to lure her into the woods. Jude's stratagem was foiled by the death of its instigator, and the widowed Joyce, meeting Gaston in the woods, learned that she was the only girl he had ever really loved. This was splendid news to Jock Filmer, Gaston's friend, who adored Ruth, and things ended in a very satisfactory manner for everybody concerned.

THE GHOST OF GRANLEIGH (August 30).—Once upon a time, a man married a beautiful woman, and then neglected her. Beautiful women cannot live without attention, and the Other Man came into the story. When the beautiful woman tried to run away with the Other Man, her husband killed her; whereupon the Other Man killed the husband, then the Other Man entered a convent—to forget.

When, four hundred years later, John Newcomb began to neglect his wife for the sake of his chemical experiments, the ghost of the Other Man who became a monk could no longer be quiet in his grave. John Newcomb loved his wife, but he was so busy with his experiments that he sometimes forgot her for considerable periods of time. Amy, the wife, did all she could to please him, but he paid so little attention to her that she at last was glad to accept the attentions of Arnold. At this point the phantom monk appeared on the scene, but his mysterious influence seemed to be of slight avail. Momentarily he could make Amy shrink from Arnold's embrace, or make Arnold cease to tempt her, but he knew that the bonds of love were knitting the two ever closer together and would soon be too strong for his unaided force to break. And Newcomb would not be aroused! Try as he might, the monk could not draw that massive brain away from its abstract reasoning. Even when the monk caused the vision of his own fatal experience to appear to the sleeping chemist, the awakened Newcomb failed to place any significance in the fanciful dream. At last the night came when Arnold in his automobile drew up at the front of the house, and Amy stole down and entered the machine. All the time Newcomb worked unconcernedly in his laboratory, while the monk, in a frenzy of despair, used his powers of influence against him in vain. As a final resort, he caused the great crucible over which Newcomb was working, to explode. Just as the machine was starting Amy heard the report, and insisted on returning. She nursed her husband back to health, and whether it was the old monk's magic, the shock of the explosion, or the tender look in Amy's eyes, it is quite certain John Newcomb was a changed man.

THE ADVENTURES OF A WATCH (August 26).—Hal Collins has just presented his fiancee, Marion Franks, with an engagement ring. Her mother gives her a watch to match the ring. In an engagement party that follows she loses the watch, which is picked up by Homer Wilson, a dissipated young man, who recognizes it as belonging to Marion. She is alone in the sitting room when he approaches her and presents the watch. She is more than delighted and gives him a rose from her hair. Coincident with this, Hal comes in, and his jealousy turns love to hatred. He demands his ring back; and, although Marion tries to explain, he refuses to listen. A few days later, Marion, out shopping, again loses her watch. This time it is picked up by a little boy, the son of a drunkard—Tom Babbitt. He shows the watch to his father, who immediately confiscates it and then sells it to a pawnbroker. Old Mr. Morton, the uncle of the dissipated young man, disinherits him. Previously he has visited the pawnbroker's and purchased Marion's watch. He concludes it would be a nice present for her, little knowing that she was the original owner. He is taken suddenly and seriously ill, but, admiring the girl, makes her the sole beneficiary under his will, and additionally sends her the watch. Just about this time Hal Collins finds out he has been very much mistaken about Marion; they are reunited, and all goes well.

THEY WERE ON THEIR HONEYMOON (August 26).—The sporty best-man, as the bride and groom are about to depart on a trip, lays a wager that the couple cannot remain incognito a week, or, if they do, that their guests will completely furnish their new home. The bride and groom make a good "get-away," and, picking up the "want ads" in the paper, observe that a hotel demands "a live bellhop" and "a neat-appearing chambermaid." They disguise themselves and secure the situations.

The new servants prove so popular with the guests that their tips are enormous, and the couple reap quite a harvest from their practical joke. At the end of the week's engagement they return to the room they rented, and, arraying themselves in all their bridal finery, go back to meet the guests of their wedding face to face, and receive the useful wager they have so ingeniously earned.

HOW BETTY MADE GOOD (August 27).—Blithesome Betty concludes that farming is pretty hard work for a girl all alone in the world and rides to town on a fine Kentucky thoroughbred to look up employment. The proprietor of the "General Store" is in bad health and desires to live in the country. He meets Betty and offers to trade his store for her horse—and she accepts his proposition.

The next day a bunch of drunken cattle punchers are "irrigating" at the saloon next door, when one of them carelessly lets off his gun at a card on the wall, and the bullet passes through, barely missing Betty. She goes immediately into the saloon to remonstrate. Some of the drunkards insult her; but Jim, the one who fired the shot, protects her and promptly falls in love with her. Later she tells him that if he will stop drinking, she will give him a job. He accepts and she puts him in charge of her quarter section. After a year of good behavior, Jim prevails upon Betty to marry him. His old friends prepare a surprise feast for the happy couple when they return from the minister's house and so the dinner is ready and all hands are in for a good time. As they are lifting their glasses of "Ohio champagne" to drink to the bride, Jim says oracularly: "Boys, if you want to drink to the health of Mrs. Jim, you'll shore have to drink water." Later, Jim buys back the horse that was the means of bringing about their happiness. So Bettie made good, likewise Jim.

THE MAN IN THE STREET (August 28).—John Street is the man on the outside, looking in at the more favored man of fortune in the Croesus Club. The rich man on the inside, looking out, is Jim Bent, who hears the stock-ticker at his elbow threatening to ruin him. The scene shifts and shows pandemonium on the Stock Exchange, as the clock strikes "one." Bent's fortunes are imperiled if he cannot secure ready money by 3 o'clock. He has a buyer for his palatial home, but the question is how to get his wife's signature to the deed, as she is in a distant city. At this point Street butts into the game and offers to get his wife's signature within an hour if Bent will make him a member of the Croesus Club. Street is familiar with the new secrets of the Telegraph Writing and Receiving Co. and manages to get Mrs. Bent on the wire and her signature to the document that will relieve the financial stringency of the Bent family, although she is a thousand miles away. Street, empty in pocket, has achieved his ambition to a membership in the Croesus Club.

In the meantime, however, the end of the month comes and Street's expense account has rolled up in lively fashion. Bent's daughter, however, has grown quite curious concerning the man who was able to secure her mother's signature in New York, so he has been invited to the house to dinner. Although he is a member of the club, he is still seeking a job on the outside, and regards a detective office as very likely. While he is there she is entertaining a wealthy friend who has a necklace of curious design, and he observes the nervous air of the Bent girl contemplating this jewelry. When he reads the following morning of a midnight robbery at the Bent mansion, he, by putting two and two together, figures out that the young heiress must in reality be a kleptomaniac. On the strength of his clews he ingeniously secures the necklace without incriminating anyone and then restores it to Mr. Bent at the club. The cleverness of the whole transaction impresses the man of wealth, and Street eventually gets a prize position in the detective agency.

THE PRICE OF THE FREE (August 29).—Three swells desert their automobile to drink the merry hours away at a road house. Looking through the window they discover a frowsy tramp asleep against a tree. They are very much amused over the hobo, and the waiter beckons him to come in. They give a toast: "it must be great to be a tramp and enjoy the life of the free." The tramp strangely enough fails to see the humor of the toast, and in response to their queries tells them his life story. He was once rich, bright and gay, and in the series of describing scenes that follow, shows how he became a wastrel and into his present sad estate. He wooed and won fair Nellie Winston. Eventually a little boy came to bless their home, fate was fair and fortune smiled upon them. Then came a dark day; death laid hand upon the child; then claimed the mother. Stunned and disheartened by the bitterness of the double blow he takes to drink and rapidly degradates. He took to the road and it was the wrong road. Without friends, without money, he fell ill by the wayside to die; but, was eventually taken to a camp of tramps who ministered to him in their rough way and brought him back to life. After a year's strolling, he was on his way back to visit the grave of his wife and child. This series of scenes depicting the adventures of the tramp moved the thoughtless drinkers so mightily that they not only do not insist upon his drinking, but are soberly impressed by the force of his example.

THE CHILD OF THE SEA (Special—2 parts—August 18).—A terrible storm at sea so badly damages the vessel under the command of Captain Warren that the crew deserts the ship in all the lifeboats available. The captain then binds his little daughter, Nellie, and wife to a spar and sets them adrift. When they are picked up by a lighthouse keeper, it is discovered that the mother has died. The little girl is cared for by the keeper. Fifteen years later Nellie, who has now grown into a beautiful woman, is the adored of Bill Jackson, the stalwart assistant keeper, which fact falls so upon the nerves of Jim Arnold, of the coast patrol, that he writes an anonymous letter to Warren, who had been rescued from the wreck, and who has become a government inspector of lighthouses, telling him that the keeper of Far Point light is so old that he is incapacitated from doing his work and that the assistant is a drunkard.

One night, sometime later, as Jackson is going to attend to the light he is felled by a hard blow on the head by Arnold. This is seen by Nellie, who, while wanting to go to the aid of her lover, sees the greater necessity of attending to the light. She is followed by Arnold after he has deposited the body on the rocks where the rising tide would get him and thereby give the impression that he had been drowned. Nellie has no sooner started the flaring light revolving in its orbit when she notices the trap door being raised and the head of Arnold protruding. She jumps on the trap door and holds the wood-be assassin in that position until she receives aid from the lighthouse keeper and the government inspector, who had decided to investigate the truth of the anonymous letter he had received and who, upon learning the true state of affairs from the keeper, went with him to the assistance of Nellie. There is mutual recognition between father and daughter. Instead of being drowned by the rising tide, Jackson is revived and in his company Nellie finds comfort and happiness.

LUBIN.

ON THE DUMBWAITER (August 25).—Pat Flynn, after a night at the club, refuses to respond to his wife's entreaties to rise. She leaves him and goes to the grocery store. Across the hall from Flynn lives John Falls and his wife. John is very jealous and has left for his office, after having a quarrel. Mrs. Flynn goes to the grocery store and leaves an order with instructions to have the things sent at once. Falls discovers the loss of some papers and decides to go home. The grocery boy in going to deliver the Flynn order rings the dumbwaiter bell. Flynn hears the bell ringing and rises; he is in his night shirt. He goes into the hall to the dumbwaiter, gets the groceries, but is unable to get into his flat, the door having closed upon him, for it has a Yale lock. He decides to ask the Falls if he can go through their flat on the fire-escape and into his room. As he is going along the fire-escape he is seen by Mr. Falls, who, thinking he is his wife's lover, rushes into the house. Flynn, discovering that he has left the groceries in Falls' flat and noting his scanty attire, puts on his trousers and again knocks on Mrs. Falls' door, explaining his forgetfulness, when his door slams shut again. One more he asks permission to cross the balcony to his own flat. Mrs. Falls grants his request and in shutting the door, shuts it in her husband's face. He peeps through the keyhole, sees Flynn and his wife laughing, flies, and putting his shoulder to the door, forces the lock off, rushes in, refuses to listen to wife's explanation, draws a gun and fires out of the window. A policeman hears the shot and arrives in time to prevent Falls from doing bodily harm to Flynn. An explanation is given and all ends well.

HER WOODEN LEG (August 25).—Alice, a dashing widow, takes up a collection for a wooden leg. She doesn't look as though she needed one, but most of the men fall for her plea and contribute. Seeing her continue the collection for some time and getting together and comparing notes, they decide that she is a swindler. They seek the constable to have her arrested, but as Alice has passed the constable many times and given him very sweet smiles in her good-humored way the constable argues the question with them. At length he is persuaded that it is his duty to carry out the law. The constable and the angry crowd come upon the widow just as she is coming from the express office. She has a large box in her arms and they are all anxious to know what it contains. Upon the officer's demand for an explanation of affairs, she leads the crowd to the poorer quarter of the town to a dilapidated dwelling and there sitting on the steps is a poor man with only one leg. This is the man that she was taking up the collection for.

THE REFORMED OUTLAW (August 26).—An outlaw in holding up a stage meets "the girl"; he leaves his trace of felony, deserts his fellow bandits and becomes a hermit and an honest man. Ten years later he returns to the city and there, through an accident, meets "the girl" of his dreams. An unknown power draws them together in spite of the fact that she is married. A jealous and impotent traitor tries to deliver him to the hands of justice, but his attempts are frustrated by Gentleman Jack and he leaves and returns to the humble life of a wood chopper, only later to see his sweetheart riding along with her husband. He determines to play a joke on them. He holds up the girl and her husband, but she recognizes him and introduces him to her husband. It breaks Jack's heart and he determines to again become a knight of the road, but as he is buckling on his guns, the vision of Mary, his sweetheart, appears to him and he removes his belt, drops his irons on the ground and takes up his axe.

THE GANGSTER (Special—2 parts—August 28).—Tom Neil and Edith Baker, mission workers, one night happen upon a raid the strong arm squad is making of a crook retreat. The policemen have been frisking the men of their weapons and Phil Tannen, the leader of the gang, is being roughly handled when Edith interferes. She gets the police to let him go, thinking she sees an opportunity for reform. He accepts her mission leaflet and promises to attend the services. He attends the mission and is welcomed by Edith. He becomes deeply infatuated with her and when she and Tom leave, he follows. Tom leaves her at the door, but Phil detains her until she agrees to allow him to call. He calls, but his chance of telling Edith that he loves her is spoiled by Tom. Phil is angered and leaves, vowing that he will win her. A few drinks that evening makes him desperate and he goes to the mission at closing time. Tom and Edith are alone; Tom enters the adjoining room and Phil again pleads his love. Edith repulses him in fear. His gangster blood is aroused and he threatens to shoot Tom unless she agrees to marry him at once. To save her sweetheart's life she submits and they leave cautiously before Tom comes out from the other room.

Tom finds out where they are living. He seeks Edith, but his visit is anticipated by Phil and he admonishes Edith to tell Tom that she married for love. Edith knows that to disobey would mean Tom's death and she does as directed. Later, about the time the baby comes, evidence is furnished the police by Tom that results in the overthrow of the gang. They are arrested and taken to jail. Edith is dying and sends for Tom. The letter tells him to take the child, for she wants her to grow up good, which would be impossible under the father's influence. Tom takes the child and the maid sends a letter to Phil, telling him that the child died with his wife. The gang swear vengeance on Tom, and when they get out proceed to entrap him. When Phil returns to the rendezvous he receives word that Tom will be enticed to a deserted building where a time bomb will blow him up on the hour of four. A broken down woman confronts him and he recognized his old maid. She tells him that his child lives and gives him the address. He hurries there and finds the child. Tom is just leaving to go unknowingly to his death. Phil sees the love of the child for Tom. He enters; the child repulses his caresses and kisses. He finds the letter from Edith to Tom and his mind reverts to the impending disaster. He hurries away to save him. The gang has already bound Tom and placed him in front of a bomb built upon the back of an alarm clock. It is within a few moments of the hour and the gang is waiting for the explosion. Phil goes to the window, but it is barred. He, reaching through the bars with a pole, catches the end of it through the top ring of the clock and pulls it through the window. As he backs away with it there is an explosion, the full force of which he receives. The gang goes to the shack. There they find Phil dying. He insists that they bring Tom to him. Phil begs Tom's forgiveness, which is granted. He then makes the gang promise to leave Tom alone, for the sake of his child and tells Tom he must carry out Edith's dying wish.

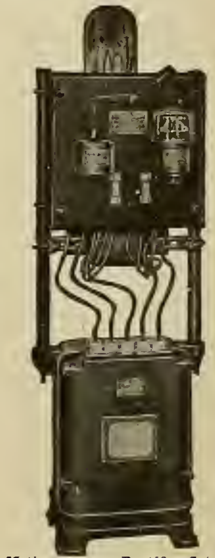
The Use of a Rectifier Makes Pictures More Brilliant

It is well recognized that for the projection of pictures, the direct current arc lamp is far superior to the lamp using alternating current. The light is more steady and intense, and a far greater proportion of the light is directed toward the lens.

The ordinary lighting circuit furnishes alternating current only, but by using a G-E Mercury Arc Rectifier, this alternating current is changed into direct current.

The use of the rectifier makes possible much more brilliant pictures than can be obtained when alternating current is used in the lamp.



Motion Picture Rectifier Set
Rear View

The operation of the rectifier is easy and its use decreases the cost of the electricity consumed at the same time that it improves the quality of the pictures.

Write our nearest office for Booklet B-3107 giving the results of comparative tests on projection lamps using alternating and direct current, and explaining the operation of the rectifier.

HIS LAST CROOKED DEAL (August 30).—He is the noted gambler of the county and the most disliked, because of his habit of invariably winning. One day a pretty little woman arrives and is announced as the new postmistress. The male population is all in love with her, but she is partial to none, until she meets Dawson, who impresses her as being different from the rest. He proposes, but she tells him she cannot marry a gambler. He finally wins her by making a promise to reform. When he seeks work everyone refuses him because of his former profession. He pawns all of his personal effects, piece by piece, telling his wife that the money is wages. One day he is given a real job as laborer at a rock crusher, but he is unequal to the task and is discharged. He returns home to find he has been ejected for failure to pay rent. In cheaper quarters his wife falls ill. The doctor says it is due to impoverishment and prescribes wholesome food. Dawson is in despair. His wife forces him to take her wedding ring to obtain money. On his way home with the money obtained by pawning the ring he passes the gambling hall. He tries to resist, but the desire to play and win overcomes him. He wins and wins honestly. One by one the players drop out until only Dawson and one opponent remain. The cards are dealt. The stakes are high. The opponent "stands pat." Dawson is afraid to take any chances. To play straight might mean no food and death for her; to play crooked is safe and sure. He plays it crooked and fools them all but one. This one tells the loser how it happened, the deck is inspected and an extra queen is discovered. Dawson has fed his wife a bowl of hot broth and she falls into a peaceful sleep. He hears a sound at the door and opens it when he finds himself looking down the muzzle of the loser's six-shooter. He is about to be handled roughly by the crowd when the loser sees the sick wife, surmises what the situation is and asks Dawson if that was the reason he did it. Dawson says it was. The loser's attitude changes. He tears up the queen and throws it out of the window. The crowd starts to leave when Dawson calls them back and swears to them that he has played his last crooked deal.

HIS CONSCIENCE (August 29).—Robert Harwood, who has been a successful "Raffles" in England, succeeds after making a big haul in making his escape to America. On the voyage over he makes the acquaintance of several influential people, and upon his arrival in America he is taken into society. There he meets and falls in love with a lovely girl. He resolves to marry her and becomes an honorable member of society. With the beginning of the new and honorable life his conscience begins to trouble him. He meets one man and conceives a dread of him, his conscience making him cowardly. Finally on the night of the announcement of his engagement he realizes he is being shadowed. He loves Alice Martin truly and decides he will not link her life with his crime-stained one. He breaks off their engagement, gives himself up to the detective and so secures peace of mind and conscience.

ESSANAY.

THE LOVE THEFT (August 26).—"Old Tom," a clerk for many years in the employ of Mr. Frank Berresford, is very fond of his employer's little daughter, Grace. Grace presents her father with a birthday gift—a picture of herself in an expensive frame. "Old Tom" naturally becomes impressed with it, and while clearing up his employer's desk, absent-minderly puts the picture in his pocket and takes it home. This act causes poor "Old Tom" so much trouble that everyone is happy when things are straightened out.

HIS ATHLETIC WIFE (August 27).—Mrs. Strong, by reason of a good right arm, is absolute manager of her husband and his finances. While on a shopping expedition she collides with a passer-by, spilling the contents of her purse. After they are restored to her, she misses her husband's pocketbook, and thinking the gentleman who bumped into her took it, she gives chase and succeeds in taking a pocketbook away from him. She relates the incident to her husband. He discovers his purse on the dresser. The restoration of the pocketbook to its rightful owner is very amusing.

WHAT CUPID DID (August 27).—Miss Hight, very much in love with her elderly sweetheart, refuses the attentions of a nice young chap, thereby displeasing her mother. Grandmother takes the young girl's part. In confidence, grandmother and granddaughter show each other their fiancees pictures. They are both surprised, as Miss Hight finds grandmother's lover is very young. Imagine the consternation of Mr. and Mrs. Hight when they discover grandmother has married Mr. King, Jr., and daughter presents her husband as Mr. King Sr.

THE EPISODE AT CLOUDY CANYON (August 28).—Fred Harris, a young Westerner, seeing a half-breed Mexican beating a horse, reprimands him. The half-breed draws a gun on Harris, but he quickly subdues the brute. Unknowingly, he has made an enemy of the half-breed, who decides to "get him." During the day, Harris has an argument with a drunken cowpuncher, and when Harris is found shot, the cowpuncher is naturally thought to be the guilty one. Charles Harris, Fred's brother, is the sheriff, and when the cowpuncher is left alone with him, he cannot control his angry passions, and attempts to kill him. He is saved from the terrible crime, however, by the timely arrival of the posse, who inform him that they have found the real desperado. The rejoicing is genuine.

A WESTERN SISTER'S DEVOTION (August 30).—Evelyn Hicks, a beautiful daughter of the West, becomes engaged to Broncho Billy, while at an informal dance. Sheriff Hardley, laid up with an injured ankle, sends for Broncho Billy, swears him in as sheriff, and instructs him to capture the two horse thieves that were causing considerable disturbance in the surrounding territory. Imagine the surprise, humiliation and pain Broncho Billy suffers when he discovers that one of the bandits is the brother of the girl he loves. A chase follows, which results in the new sheriff capturing the outlaw—but not the real one, for the real one had escaped and Broncho Billy captures the girl he loves. Just see how the rest of this excellent Western subject turns out.

BROKEN THREADS UNITED (Special—2 parts—August 29).—Hiram Daniels lives in the country with his daughter, Chloe, a winsome little lass who is very fond of her dad. The father, a kindly, simple-hearted old man, is called away to the city on business, and he and Chloe reluctantly bid each other good-bye.

Daniels, while walking down one of the city's fashionable streets, sees a woman drop her purse as she is about to step into an automobile. He gallantly rescues it from the sidewalk and returns it to her. She smiles and graciously thanks him as she hands him her card. Daniels is struck with the beauty of the woman and gives her his card in return.

Ann Taylor, on arriving at her apartment, tells her companions of the incident, which amuses them immensely. Ann tells the others that he is an easy mark and that if they will help her she will "work" him for all he is worth. At Anne's invitation Daniels calls on her several times. He becomes infatuated with the woman and proposes marriage. He secures a license, and one of Ann's companions, disguised as a minister, goes through the form of marrying the pair. Daniels brings his supposed wife to his home in the country and introduces her to his daughter. Chloe is brokenhearted, and after denouncing the woman and reproaching her father she leaves home with the determination of earning her own living. When Daniels discovers that his daughter is gone he goes for consolation and advice to Jim Halliday, Chloe's sweetheart. Daniels and Jim leave to search for Chloe.

Chloe goes to the city and through an accident gets a position with a motion picture company. Daniels and Jim obtain the service of a detective to help them in their search for Chloe, and when showing him a picture of his daughter also shows him one of his wife. The detective recognizes her as one of a band of notorious crooks. Ann writes her friends that "the old fool has gone to the city, and if anything should happen to him I can let you have that $5,000." Her "tools" waylay the old man and entice him into a closed room of a "shady" cafe, where they try to poison him. The detective has followed them and reaches the cafe just in time to save the old man's life. The two criminals are arrested. In the meantime, Jim Halliday finds Chloe and takes her to the hotel where she is overjoyed to see her father again. The three, along with the detective, take the next train home where they discover Ann and her real husband, who has come to warn her, ready to make their escape. They are taken to police headquarters. Father and daughter are together again, "Broken Threads United," and the little romance that started in the cornfields is ended with the father's blessing as Jim claims Chloe for his own.

KALEM.

—THE INVADERS (Special—2 parts—August 27).—Not being successful in his suit for the hand of Helen Sawyer, and to show the father of the young lady that he is made of the same material as he is, John Thrope, a wealthy New Yorker, leaves for the West, but without any predetermined destination. While traveling, however, he meets an old man called Uncle Billy, and upon this man's advice, Thrope purchases a ranch in Buffalo, Wyo. Not long afterwards, the homesteaders are accused by the large cattle owners of stealing their cattle, and they give Tom Horn, commonly known as "The Killer," a list of those they desire to get rid of. Thrope's name heads the list, but The Killer finds that Thrope is his match and is thrown down. For this Thrope wins the admiration of Cora Sands, the sweetheart of The Killer. As they are walking along the road, they are seen by Helen and her father, he having been summoned there to look after his ranch near Buffalo.

Upon the suggestion of Sawyer, the large cattle owners formulate a plan to annihilate the homesteaders, and The Killer goes to Buffalo to get help and warns Cora Sands that he is going to kill Thrope. Acting upon his threat Cora goes to advise Thrope of his impending death, but finds that he had left. Fearing for his safety, she dresses as a boy and follows him. She is mistaken for Thrope by The Killer and is shot. In the melee between the homesteaders and the bad men, Thorpe is wounded. He manages to reach Sawyer's house, where he is rescued from the clutches of The Killer by the timely arrival of the troops. Later, realizing that she does really care for Thrope, Helen gains her father's consent to be his wife.

FOOL LUCK (August 22).—Mr. and Mrs. Jinks have an apartment on the floor above Mr. and Mrs. Bangs. On Saturday morning as each husband leaves for work his wife impresses upon him the importance of bringing home the pay envelope.

On the way home Bangs tarries at a tavern with some of his cronies and the pay envelope is soon emptied. Jinks attends a sales of unclaimed baggage and purchases a grip. He finds that it contains a suit of clothes, a dress and a statue.

When Bangs arrives home with no money his wife upbraids him and drives him into the street. Upstairs Mrs. Jinks is disgusted because the dress does not fit her and throws it out the window. It strikes Bangs on the head. He picks it up and hastens to his wife, telling her he purchased it with his wages. The same thing happens to the suit of clothes, but unexpected complications arise when the statue is thrown out.

DECEIVING UNCLE ASA (August 22).—Uncle Asa is distressed over the reports which he hears concerning his nephew, Bill, and informs the young man by a letter that if he marries at once he will present him with $10,000. Uncle also asks that he be chosen as best man.

Bill has no desire to get married, but concocts a scheme with the assistance of his roommate, Bob. Bob masquerades as a girl and Bill, a friend, pretends to be a minister. It looks as if Bill has completely deceived his uncle until a most unfortunate incident exposes the plot.

THE SMUGGLER'S LAST DEAL (August 23).—As Tom Hardy, a Customs officer, sits on the beach with his sweetheart, Jennie Morgan, he spies a vessel and levelling his telescope he is surprised to discover that the ship bears no name. The incident arouses his suspicions as he has spent no little time in an investigation of the smuggling operations in that vicinity. Later he recognizes the captain as Pete Hefton, a notorious smuggler, and trails him to the "Black Crow Inn."

Jennie's uncle is the proprietor of the little hotel and she suggests to Tom a plan whereby he may overhear a conference which Hefton is to hold with some of his fellows. Tom creeps into the old fireplace and ascends the chimney, suspending himself with a rope.

The girl is not aware that her uncle is implicated with the smugglers and is startled to discover him taking part in the quiet conversation. One of the smugglers declares that the room is cold and lights a fire. The girl sees that her sweetheart is in imminent peril, but does not dare to disclose his presence. Through a subterfuge she decoys the men from the room and liberates Tom.

As Tom slips away to secure assistance of the coast guards in rounding up the smugglers, Jennie realizes that she has nothing in common with her unscrupulous uncle and succeeds in keeping the band together until Tom arrives. A desperate struggle takes place and again the girl's resourcefulness is brought into play. When quiet is restored Tom gains a double reward.

THE BLIND BASKET WEAVER (August 25).—Paul, a blind basket weaver, plies his trade at a small seaside village. Anna, a cripple, is madly in love with the handsome young man. He does not know of her deformity and Dolly, who also loves him, is too tender-hearted to tell.

Dr. Arnold and his bride visit the village on their honeymoon. The doctor finds that he can restore Paul's sight by a simple operation, and gives Anna his card. Paul and Dolly are overjoyed, but Anna fears he will have nothing to do with her should he recover his sight and discover her deformity. Dolly determines to have the operation. She goes to the hotel and finds to her dismay that the doctor has been called back to the city by an urgent telegram. She regains her good spirits when she remembers that Anna has the doctor's card, bearing his address. Anna is tempted and says that she has lost the card. When she sees Paul's grief she cannot bear to deceive him, and pretends to find the card. Together they write a pathetic little note to Dr. Arnold requesting him to return.

He does return and performs the operation. Several weeks later, when the bandages are to be removed from Paul's eyes, Dolly and Anna wait anxiously outside the door. Paul wishes to have Anna by his side. The girl enters the house and sits beside him, holding his hand. As the doctor starts to remove the bandages she can stand it no longer, and has him send for Dolly. Dolly substitutes her hand for Anna's. Anna rushes blindly from the house and towards the cliffs. Paul sees the beauties of the world for the first time by Dolly's side, while at the foot of the cliffs Anna's poor little body is found, bruised and broken.

THE CAPTIVATING WIDOW (August 29).—Because they never miss a meal or pay a cent, Bill and Jim consider themselves "star boarders," but the widow thinks otherwise and takes them to task. They see the cordial manner in which she receives Joe, her sweetheart, but when they attempt to win her heart they are spurned. A great scheme occurs to them. Bill tosses a bucket of water over Jim and drags him into the house, announcing that he tried to end his life because of the widow's cruelty. The widow's heart is touched and it looks as if the schemers will carry their point until the infuriated lover steps into the stream and shows that it is scarcely knee-deep.

NEW YORK

MIKE, THE TIMID COP (August 29).—Nora, the cook, is charmed by the uniform and frequently entertains the roundsman in the kitchen. This is quite distressing to Mike, the iceman, and when he complains Nora tells him he will have to join the force before she will consider him.

Determined to make good, Mike joins the force. His attention is called to a reward which is offered for Slippery Pete, a noted burglar.

A butcher is killing some chickens when one escapes him and he chases it down the alley with his cleaver. Mike mistakes the butcher's purpose and flees in terror. His flight carries him right into the arms of the burglar. When he has secured the reward, Mike resigns from the force, declaring that he will not be able to risk his life after he is married.

A RAILROAD CONSPIRACY (August 30).—Jorans, a railroad engineer, is over fond of liquor. His wife's warnings are to no avail. One morning the yard-master finds him drinking and immediately discharges the man. The Jorans have always lived beyond their income and consequently have very little money saved. Several weeks later they are dispossessed and their furniture thrown out in the yard. Mabel, a neighbor, offers them a temporary home in a small shanty adjoining her house. They gratefully accept her offer.

A number of crooks conspire to rob a freight car of a valuable shipment of silk. They wish to get the car out of the yards and persuade Jorans to help them. The large sum of money they offer dazzles him and when his wife overhears the plot and threatens to inform the authorities, she is bound and locked up in the shanty. Mabel discovers the woman's predicament accidentally and frees her. As soon as Mrs. Jorans revives they hasten to the railroad station and give the alarm. The thieves have stolen an engine and with Jorans as engineer, have pulled the car out of the yard. A telegraph operator at a distant station is notified and receives instructions to stop the train if he has to wreck it. A number of laborers are working nearby. They tear up the tracks. The train approaches and is derailed as a pursuing engine bearing Mrs. Jorans and Mabel pulls up behind it.

Jorans, through his own action and guilty conscience, loses his life, while his two accomplices are secured by the authorities.

MELIES.

IN THE LAND OF FIRE (August 21).—A highly interesting and educational full reel of the geysers, mud volcanoes and boiling springs of New Zealand. The steaming valley of Tikitere and close views of the boiling mud and its various ways of eruption. The great Wairakei geyser, whose plays of boiling sulphurous water occur at intervals of about nine minutes to a height of from 10 to 40 feet, lasting two minutes. The Dragon's Mouth; the Prince of Wales' Feathers; the Black Geyser, whose water is made black by the presence of manganese; the red Coral Geyser and the "Nga Mahanga" (the Twins), all beautiful spurting springs wonderful to behold. Geysers at Whakawarewa include "Pohutu" (the Splasher), "Papakura" (the Giant's Cauldron), and "Keru" (the Pigeon) in whose waters lime, ever present, has, after years, created a wonderful apron-like formation. And others.

BIOGRAPH.

BLACK AND WHITE (August 28).—They were two hobos, black and white, master and man, a regular slave driver white, while black went off for the eats. But Cleopatra and her sweet-potato pies ended the despotism. She saved the "lovin' man" of her race. Tabasco and an officer of the law did it, while white made a fast retreating speck up the track.

OBJECTIONS OVERRULED (August 28).—The chief objection was that he could not pay his board bill—that was why father said "No," but being a far-sighted parent, all was forgotten when the lawyer found the heir.

Picture Theaters Projected.

EVERYBODY'S WEARING THEM (August 27).—Sally, who loves Willie, is partial to whiskers; the grocery boy, having a sprouting beard, she momentarily transfers her affections to him. Willie, who has seen his new rival embrace Sally, drives him away from the house. He finds the circular which the latter has left, lauding the virtues of a hair producer and determines to buy some of the nostrum. More especially since Sally tells him that the man she marries must have a beard.

Willie finds the demonstrator of the fluid, and takes his turn in the line of young men who are anxious to grow beards. The mothers of the youths angrily drag their respective offspring away. Willie, however, has succeeded in purchasing a bottle of hair grower and conceals it under his coat as his mother leads him away, and succeeds in surreptitiously applying some of the fluid before reaching home. Willie is sent to work at the wood pile, and Sally teases him about his lack of hirsuit charms.

Left alone, Willie uses more of the liquid, and just then his mother again appears for wood. He hides the bottle in a hollow log. The mother gathers the log, along with several others, and carries it into the house. Willie follows her in suspense, and as she is about to put the log containing the bottle into the stove, he pretends to have a toothache. He goes to the cupboard and taking the label from the bottle of linament there, secures the hair grower during his mother's absence and substitutes the linament label for the tonic label, secreting the hair grower bottle in the cupboard. Willie's mother returns, and getting the supposed "linament" bottle from the cupboard, she vigorously applies same to Willie's face and bandages up his jaw.

He resists his mother's attempts to remove the bandage later, fearing the whiskers may have appeared. He secures a hand mirror, and going out to the wood pile, takes a look at his face and sees the whiskers sprouting. Sally, on her way to join the grocery boy in a buggy ride, refuses to notice Willie. As she is about to start off, Willie undoes the bandage about his face, disclosing a full beard. Sally sees this, and jumping from the buggy, embraces Willie, leaving the grocery boy to drive away alone.

Sally and Willie enter the yard, when the mother, not recognizing her son, tries to drive them away. Finally she sees who it is and scolds him. She discovers the supposed bottle of hair grower and throws it from the window. A number of children find it and proceed to rub it on their faces. Sally comes on and takes the bottle from the children. She is about to enter the house, when she sees his mother desecrating Willie's pet whiskers with a pair of scissors.

Entering the house, the mother complains of toothache and takes the supposed bottle of linament from the cupboard and rubs it on her face. Soon the whiskers sprout on her face. She looks in the glass and is horror-struck at the sight of a beard appearing. She throws the bottle out of the window.

In the meantime, the demonstrator, Mlle. Spinach, has ceased selling hair restorer and now sells hair remover. The parents of the children eagerly purchase the latter, and Sally also secures a bottle to remove her mother's whiskers. She returns to the house to find that Willie's whiskers have again grown, and together they go to the mother and promise to give her the hair remover if she will allow them to marry. The mother consents.

THE FOLLY OF IT ALL (August 29).—The Rev. Edwin August and Frank Ward are intimate friends from boyhood. Finally, falling in love with Jane Armstrong, they both propose at the same time and she accepts Edwin. Despite his disappointment, Frang remains Edwin's friend, is a frequent caller at Edwin's home, a friend of his wife, and later of his little daughter. Edwin is planning a great surprise for his wife—a new home in the country. His supervision of the building necessitates many absences from home, and as he does not account for these satisfactorily, Jane becomes uneasy and later suspicious. Frank comforts her for a time until finally he, too, becomes suspicious. Meantime, Edwin has become the intended victim of a band of thieves and they trail him from his country place back to his home and plan to rob the house.

The night of the burglary is the night that Jane decides she cannot stand Edwin's absence any longer. She breaks down and asks Frank for his advice. He suggests a plan to waken Edwin's love, which both believe he still holds for her, but which has simply become dormant. They write a letter and place it in Edwin's hands with the instructions that it remains unopened until he is instructed. Edwin is puzzled, but accedes to their request. He places the letter in his strong box and continues with his work.

Later that evening Edwin finds that he needs Jane's signature to some papers. He rises and is about to enter the adjoining room when he sees Jane in Frank's arms. Thunderstruck, his first thought is revenge. He hurries to his desk and searches fruitlessly for a revolver and then rushes up the stairs to his room. The thieves, watching on the outside, take this opportunity to enter. As they start their work at his desk he returns. The watcher conceals himself behind the curtain while his female accomplice enters the adjoining room.

Imagining Iva has been captured, the accomplice fires blindly through the portierres, killing her. Edwin hears the shot and comes upon Dick as he is about to commit suicide. Dick frantic through realizing that he has accidently shot his pal. It is then that Jane and the friend come on and make explanations.

Jane begs him to open the envelope in the box. He does so, and realizes the awful mistake he barely escaped making. The letter explains that the love making between Jane and Frank was but a subterfuge. It was intended that he should see it and they thought that through that means his love would be awakened. The picture ends with a view of Edwin, Jane and Frank overlooking the new country home.

A WOMAN'S STRATAGEM (August 28).—Margarita Radcliff loves Bob Asquith, her father's confidential secretary. Radcliff & Company, brokers, have battled for control of the L. M. & O. with Schwartz, another broker, for years, and although Schwartz has resorted to underhand means, he has so far been worsted. Frank Harvey, old Radcliff's partner, through speculation loses his private fortune completely. Schwartz, knowing this, bribes him to tip him on the Radcliff inside policy. Harvey, to recoup his private losses, agrees to this and the next day he tells Schwartz the details of the Radcliffe closed meeting, at which only directors and Bob were present. Schwartz takes advantage of this information and taunts Radcliff in the exchange, falsely laying the blame on Bob. Radcliffe, in a fury, hastens to his office and discharges Bob without a hearing. Harvey tells this to Schwartz, who is duly pleased at the success of his plan. Bob hastens to Margarita with the news of his dismissal, and she vainly entreats her father to investigate and reinstate Bob. The old man refuses and Bob is ignored as a traitor in the exchange.

Schwartz & Co. advertise for a new stenographer a few days later, and Margarita determines to apply for the position and learn, if possible, who is the real traitor. She gets the position (being unknown to Schwartz), and at the next closed meeting of the Radcliff Co., she learns that their decision is to reach Schwartz. She watches anxiously at the given time and sees the decision "Sell L. M. & O." flashed by means of a mirror, from the Radcliff office to the Schwartz office wall. Hurrying out as soon as she can get away, she telegraphs Bob to meet her at her father's office next morning.

The next morning Margarite and Bob appear, denounce Harvey as the traitor and Bob is welcomed back. Meanwhile, Bob turns the markets and Schwartz's plans are frustrated and himself ruined. His revenge falls on his tool, Harvey, and he chokes him into insensibility.

THE CALL (August 31).—Allan Dawn, the son of a millionaire, whose penchant for tramping incurs the displeasure of his father, receives a letter threatening to discontinue further remittances until the practice is abandoned. Having complete faith in his ability to take care of himself, he lingers in a particular neighborhood because of the influence of a girl's face, the girl being the daughter of a mother whose financial condition necessitates the taking in of laundry. To rob idleness of its sting he starts a small department store, a move which attracts the attention of the village flirt, whose favors are directed to those whose financial condition might mean her betterment. Her attitude, however, is easily fathomed by Allan, who respects her accordingly.

Then comes the day of the village lawn fete when every self-believed belle is bedecked her best. Flo, she who impressed Allan from the first, attends, but with an aching heart—her clothes are shabby in comparison with the others. The flirt adds to her pain by comment on her appearance, and Flo's mother, having heard and realized the pang caused to her daughter, sacrifices her honor later in stealing from Allan's store goods with which to make Flo a more dainty dress for the future. Later Allan identifies the stolen goods on Flo, and, although hurt by his suspicions, he refrains from revealing his thoughts. As time went by the father, whose age and love called for his only son, writes and asks forgiveness, begging that he return to the lonesome dad.

Meanwhile, the feeling of sympathy between Flo and Allan developed into sentiment that compelled. The mother again added to the stain of theft that her daughter's happiness might continue unblighted. The identification was revealed to Allan, whose better nature and belief in Flo's innocence again prompted silence.

The press, meanwhile, has discovered the masquerading of the well known millionaire, and the papers vaunted the news accordingly. Coming to the eyes of the flirt, who had long past discarded Allen for a more gullible subject, she realizes the fallacy of her misdirected efforts and promptly tries to make amends by gushing sentiment of affection—chaff that disgusted with its utterance. He sought seclusion in his little store with its tender association, intending to await the time for meeting with Flo. In the store, compelled to hide in an effort to escape, was the mother, whose errand was a renewal of theft. He listened to her tearful confession and forgiveness came easily. He leaves her, stunned and unbelieving, for in her hands he left papers making her the owner of the store, and telling her of his intention to return home—with the girl for whom she had stolen that her dream of happiness might be complete.

NESTOR.

WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE (August 25).—Young John Burton, a successful broker, loves Ramona McCullon, daughter of a king of finance. Howard McCullom, seeing a chance to add millions to his already overflowing coffers, reckons not on the downfall of others, and "bears" the markets until hundreds of smaller brokers are caught in the whirlpool and ruined. John Burton is among them. As he sees his fortune evaporating, he rushes to McCullom and begs him to desist. Old McCullom tells him the policy which has made the McCullom name a power is to crush everything which proved an obstacle to success. Burton, heartsick, turns to leave, when he meets Ramona. The sight of her causes his just anger to rise, and he tells McCullom that the time will come when he may find that policy turned against himself. McCullom orders him from the house and his engagement to Ramona broken.

Ruined and hopeless, Burton returns to his office and decides to venture his last $500 in an effort to recoup his losses. He does so; his fortunes rise, and ere many months John Burton is a power in Wall Street. Ramona's love is still steadfast and she seeks reconciliation, but the gold lust in Burton's heart kills all other love. As fate turns Burton's balance high, McCullom's goes lower, until by the end of a year, he is powerless and Burton ruins him completely in the open market. Crushed by age and misfortune, McCullom is now the suppliant to Burton, and is met with the same cutting words which he formerly had addressed to Burton. Home and money lost, Ramona bravely tries to help her father and earns a meager pay as a stenographer. Late one day in returning from lunch, she is first upbraided and then insulted by her employer. Resenting the latter, she is dismissed and returns to her humble room. Old McCullom makes a final appeal to the brokers for credit, and being denied, he invests his last few dollars for a gun. Ramona, hearing of her father's death after a sleepless night, is crushed with sorrow. A few weeks later she meets Burton on the street. He, touched by the tragedy, offers her his hand. She scorns him and refuses the money his secretary takes to her. She writes Burton a note and dispatches it by the secretary. Burton, in his magnificent dining room, receives the note and reads: "I could never accept money gained by crushing human hearts. I trust the lonely after years will bring you light." As he reads the note he takes the ring she had returned to him, and in his mind's eye sees himself a lonely old man, seated at a lonely table, and his head sinks with sorrow on his breast.

THE RENUNCIATION (August 27).—Jack Burns, who has left city life to establish a position and home in Slate Rock, Cal., a mining town, where he can eventually bring Clara as his bride, is elected sheriff of the town. He receives a letter from her telling him that, because of his fondness for gambling and drinking, her father has cast off her brother, Fred, and that she is sending Fred out to Slate Rock. She asks Jack to make a man of Fred, for her sake, and to keep him from gambling.

Fred is not pleased with his poor surroundings, and finds time hanging heavy on his hands, as he has no inclination to work. While Jack is attending to his duties, Fred goes to the saloon and makes the acquaintance of its frequenters. There he imbibes freely and joins in a game, losing heavily. Jack, returning to the cabin after his day's work, becomes worried at Fred's continued absence, and starts out in search of him. He finds him in the saloon. Jack reprimands him and takes Fred back to the cabin. The next morning, while at breakfast, Jack is called away to quell a fight among some prospectors. Left alone Fred becomes restless and seeks diversion in a ride. He rides along the river bed where some of the prospectors are panning for gold. One of them has succeeded in obtaining a sack full of fine specimens, which Fred comes upon while the man has gone to the next claim to borrow some tobacco. Temptation proves too strong for Fred, and he takes the sack of nuggets. The prospectors see him in the act, and fire after him, but Fred manages to make his escape.

Jack comes upon the scene and the prospectors tell him of the theft, not knowing the identity of the man. Jack gives chase and sees the culprit running into a tunnel to hide. Jack follows, and in the struggle which ensues, the timbers in the tunnel give way. Fred is knocked unconscious, but Jack, groping around by the light of matches, manages to dig a hole large enough to crawl through. He drags the culprit with him through the opening, and upon reaching daylight, is horrified to recognize Fred as the guilty man. When Fred regains consciousness, he protests his innocence, but a search of his person reveals the stolen nuggets. Jack recognizes his duty and performs it, knowing it means the renunciation of his love. He puts Fred in jail, and then going to his cabin, with his heart full of grief, he takes the photographs of Clara and burns them, together with all his hopes of happiness.

CUPID'S BAD AIM (August 29).—Bay Center grows too monotonous for Jack Armstrong, and when the offer comes from a city firm, he accepts the position and leaves. His little sweetheart, Nellie, is heartbroken at his departure. Arriving in the city he is placed in his new position by old Stuyvesant, and finds the Great White Way much to his liking. Laura Stuyvesant, the pampered daughter of the millionaire, visits his office, and during her stay sees Jack and at once falls in love with him. Used to having her own way, she demands that Jack be allowed to accompany her for a ride in her new car. Father expostulates in vain and Jack is taken off for a ride. Time passes and Jack is invited to dinner by the boss—wined and dined until in a champagne inspired moment, he makes violent love to Miss Laura in the conservatory. Father appears, and taking in the situation at a glance, pronounces his blessing on their engagement. A letter reaches the little Bay Centre sweetheart from Jack, that their engagement is off and she promptly turns her attention to a dashing young captain. Father, with the prospect of a son-in-law, now departs on a vacation, and by chance selects Bay Centre as his destination. Here he gets board with Jack's former sweetheart's family.

Wilful Miss Laura takes advantage of father's absence to give an engagement dinner, and at its close the guests, warmed with the Stuyvesant champaign, dare the bride and groom to marry there and then. The dare is accepted, and Jack wakes to find lacy lingerie in his room, and is told of his marriage by his bride. Jack's note announcing his engagement and ending with: "I shall never see you again," reaches Nellie. Meanwhile, father has not been quite out of the running and now gains the consent of the village belle to share his lot with him. Jack scarcely recovers from the shock of his wedding when Laura receives the wire to prepare the house for dad's return, accompanied by his bride. Little dreaming of the surprise in store for him, Jack comes downstaids to meet his new mother, and beholds his old sweetheart. As the fact of Nellie's being his mother-in-law dawns on him, he faints in his wife's arms.

TWO HEARTS AND A THIEF (August 29).—The affectionate courtship of Eddie and Daisey is suddenly interrupted by the return of Daisy's father, who, without recemony, invites the youthful lover to depart. This, however, is not the end of their wooing. Eddie resolves to make a grand rush for the hand of his heart's desire with all the romance befitting to an elopement. He advises Daisy of his purpose to call for her that evening. The romantic and adventurous tendencies of the young girl's heart are naturally attracted by her lover's plan of action, and prepares to immediately execute in preparation.

That evening, father, while busily engaged with his cash box, attracts the attention of a second-story man, who registers a resolve to secure the valuables. As the hour for Eddie's visit draws near, Daisy becomes nervous at her father's presence. She is, however, suddenly relieved by her father's preparation of leave for a nearby cigar stand, and accepts his habitual smoke as a decree of fate. Taking hurried advantage of his absence, the burglar, upon noting the father's leave, also decides to make the best of his absence and promptly enters the house.

Eddie arrives in accordance with schedule, and hurriedly enters the house, joining Daisy in her preparation to leave. The untimely arrival of her father drives the burglar into the seclusion of a closet, also awkwardly interferes with the elopers' plan. Pressed by time and space, Eddie enters the closet where the burglar is concealed. Two unusual situations are shown between the lover and the burglar, who find themselves unexpectedly closeted together and Daisy, her father, and others in the room. The tensity of the situation is suddenly relieved by Eddie and the burglar rolling from the closet into the midst of the surprised occupants of the room. The burglar, upon recovering his feet, hurriedly bolts, followed in mad pursuit by all but Eddie and Daisy, who gather their trappings and hurriedly leave for the waiting motor. The pursuers, upon overtaking the burglar, pause to gather their breath, as Eddie and Daisy motor past, waving in congratulation to their bewildered father, who swoons at the sight. In the excitement the burglar escapes.

WHAT GIRLS WILL DO (August 25).—Stopping at a fashionable hotel at the seashore are a number of beautiful girls. They have exhausted their fund and are just longing for a man to turn up, each vowing to herself to capture him. At last the man arrives in the person of Harry Morgan, a wealthy young man who is an habitual flirt, and who sought this particular hotel when he learned of conditions there. The girls make desperate love to him and he flirts with them all. But at every turn he is circumvented from making any real headway with one alone—for the other girls always appear upon the scene.

The landlady has a charming daughter, demure, shy and sweet, utterly unlike the society girls—and Harry, instead of flirting, falls head over heels in love with her. He outwits the girls and asks Mary to be his wife. They are married, and the girls, angry and disappointed over their failure to capture him, write a letter purporting to come from Harry's wife in New York. Mary reads the letter, thinks she has been deceived, and gives way to grief. The girls, frightened, confess to the writing of the letter, beg forgiveness, which is granted, and go to their rooms, sadder but wiser.

HIS AUNT EMMA (August 26).—Barnett and Belmont make a date to play poker that night. Knowing that it will be impossible to get away from his wife, Barnett has Belmont send him a telegram that his wealthy old Aunt Emma is dangerously ill and about to die, and asking him to come and see her. Belmont sends the telegram. Barnett goes home and Pearl, having bought tickets for the theatre, wants him to take her, as planned. He pleads a headache, and they call it off. She makes him go to bed. He goes, expecting every minute to get the telegram. Meanwhile the messenger boy meets another who invites him to a moving picture show. They go, the first youngster forgetting all about the message. Later, after the show, he remembers the telegram and delivers it. Barnett meanwhile had fallen asleep and when Pearl wakes him up he pretends that he does not want to go. She compels him to. He arrives at the poker game just as it is breaking up in a row, and all the men are thrown out into the street. There they fight and are arrested. Barnett is lodged in a cell, with the rest. The next morning Aunt Emma, who suddenly decided to pay her nephew and niece a visit, arrives at the house, and Pearl inquires of her health. She shows her the telegram. Barnett arrives home, much the worse for wear, and Pearl asks him how he left his aunt. He tells her in a bad way, but the old lady confronts him and roundly berates him for his perfidy. She leaves, threatening to cut him off in her will, while Pearl sympathizes with him upon his promise to be good.

THAT CRYING BABY (August 26).—Brooks is a crusty old bachelor who hates children. He is annoyed by the crying of a baby in the flat directly opposite his apartments. He shouts at the child's mother to have her child keep quiet and threatens all sorts of dire things, but to no avail. The following day the mother takes her child and an older out out for a walk in the park. The older one runs away and she goes after it, leaving the baby with a strange young man. The baby again starts crying, and he determines to get rid of it. He walks out of the park, not being able to find the mother, and comes across Brooks' automobile standing unattended. He places the child in the back seat and walks away. Brooks' chauffeur returns with Brooks and they are at a loss as to what to do. Brooks takes the child home with him. Meanwhile the mother, almost frantic, keeps up her search for her baby, but at last goes home. There she sees Brooks holding her child and trying to keep it quiet. Remembering all his threats of the day previous, she rushes out, gets a policeman, and goes up to Brooks' room. Brooks is almost arrested before he can explain how it all happened, and the child being restored to its mother, she withdrew her complaint, saving Brooks from arrest, but curing him in a day of his crustiness.

THE RED HEART (August 31).—Judge Larned, having tried Michael Filippi, a member of the Red Heart Society, a desperate band of murderers, is threatened by the Society with death, unless he liberates the prisoner. The judge ignores the letter. Meanwhile the son, Frank, goes out for an auto ride. A girl, a member of the band, sees him. The auto breaks down and she informs her confederates of the presence of the judge's son near their rendezvous. They pounce upon him and make him a prisoner. They compel him to write a letter telling his father that unless the judge brings about the release of Filippi they will kill him. One of their band is sent with the letter. He calls and finds only the judge's daughter at home. He gives her the note. She goes out, gets a revolver and imprisons him in a clothes closet. Meanwhile the gang, anxious because of his absence, send one of their women to the judge's home. Miss Larned gives her a note saying that she will keep the Italian prisoner as long as they hold her brother. Upon receipt of this note they release Frank and he leaves the place, but drops playing cards as he walks along as a means of identifying the rendezvous of the gang. On the way he telephones to his father's office to bring a squad of police and later finds the meeting place through the medium of the playing cards. The gang is arrested. Meanwhile the Italian imprisoned in the closet has succeeded in breaking the lock and overpowering Miss Larned, whom he is trying to choke when the judge and his son enter in time to save her life and have the brigand arrested.

FRONTIER.

A MUCH WANTED BABY (August 28).—Harry's parents were comfortably well off, and when he married a girl whom they considered beneath them in station, he was promptly disinherited. He and Betty loved each other, however, and they set up a modest little home. But married life is expensive and in the course of time Harry's small store of savings was well-nigh exhausted. One day, as he was thinking what he had best do, he saw an article in a newspaper that told of the discovery of gold near Cabeny. Eventually he arrived at the gold field. He bought an outfit and horses. Harry exercised poor judgment in his purchase of horses and the one he was riding stumbled at the top of a hill. Harry fell and hurt himself badly. Far off in the rocks a rough old miner was working. He took the injured gold seeker to his own cabin in the hills and there after a time he convalesced, but his memory was gone. His outfit gave no clue to his identity, and perforce the miner had to keep him with him.

In the meantime a baby has come to Betty and himself, of whose existence Harry was ignorant, and poverty has attacked both his wife and son. To insure the proper provisions for the baby, she left it one night on her father-in-law's doorstep. But mother-in-law had gone away, and father-in-law did not know anything about babies, so he left the youngster with some neighbors.

The miner and Harry were working every day at the mine and had great hopes from it when, one day an extra large blast caused Harry to be struck and injured with falling rock. When he had recovered from the effects of this it was found that he had regained his memory. Of course, his first thought then was of the little wife whom he had neglected for a year. Back home he hurried.

While all this was happening, mother-in-law had returned home and she and her husband had gone to the neighbor's to reclaim the baby. But the winning ways of the little fellow had captivated the neighbors and they would not give him up. An argument ensued, and a policeman was called in to settle it. He confiscated the baby and took it to the police station. The hard-hearted chief of police ordered the baby turned over to the matron at the station and had a policeman eject the noisy quartet from his office.

About the time the quarrel was taking place Harry had returned to his home and found his wife in very poor circumstances. But he had with him a little gold from his efforts and felt able to make her comfortable. Besides, he had learned the great lesson of work and felt competent to care for a wife and child. Together he and Betty set out to regain their son. After calling at his father's house and at the neighbor's house in a frantic search, they found that the baby had been taken to the station. There they hurried and Betty made an appeal to the chief of police that convinced him of her sincerity. He had the little fellow turned over to her and she and Harry left the place happy.

MAYA—JUST AN INDIAN (August 30).—Her teachers at Carlisle had great hopes for Maya. They thought she might carry the message of civilization to her tribe, because she became so thoroughly Americanized. But it was not many months after she returned to them before she had gone back to the life of her ancestors. Yellow Horse, her Indian suitor, was glad to see this. Bill West, returning empty-handed from a prospecting trip, heard from the old trader that True Eagle, Maya's father, knew where there was gold. He attempted to learn the secret of his tribe from the aged chieftian, but failed. In Maya, however, yearning to be wooed as the white man would, he found an easy tool. Telling her he loved her, he induced her to learn the secret, which she obtained from her father, only upon a pledge never to see Bill again. But evening found her with him and True Eagle grew nervous when he found she was absent from the village. He went in search of them and found Maya and Bill at the site of the gold. He expelled her from the tribe and would have driven Bill away from the place, but the prospector told him Maya was his wife.

Unmolested by the Indians, Bill panned his gold. Finally he made preparations to leave and Maya, resigned now to his brutality and loving him in spite of it, opposed his plans as soon as she discovered it. But he paid no attention to her and left after denouncing her.

Two years passed and True Eagle learned from the trader that Bill was near at hand in a little settlement on the railroad. Imparting the news to Yellow Horse he planned revenge for Bill's treachery, but Maya was before him. She had overheard the tale, and hate grew within her. She thought she saw a way to win Bill back, to wrest from him the wife he had taken from the white people, and to live again with the man she left to be hers.

She got the gold from its hiding place and went to the little settlement. An hour's wait at the post-office brought Bill in search of the letter and money he had asked the trader to lend him. Maya followed him home. Soon he left to call a doctor, for his wife was very ill with consumption. This indeed was the cause of his return to the mountain country. Into the house went Maya, and there she found the woman. She thought she was sleeping, but soon discovered that her stillness was that of illness. There, too, was the baby that had been born to them. Maya's heart, warmed by hate, grew cold again. She laid the gold down, renouncing with it all hope of winning back her man again, laid upon it the knife she had brought for his wife and went away.

Bill returned to his home, found the gold and the knife and understood. It was the other side of the page he had read two years before, when he opened the gold bag and found worthless rocks and sand. Now he again had the precious metal he had digged from the Indian stream, the value he had filched from their secret hiding place. And Maya, he didn't bother about her, she was "just an injun" anyway.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN (3 parts—August 25).—George Harris determines to escape from his cruel master. One day while he is working with other slaves hauling logs out of a swamp he sneaks away, making his way to the house of George Shelby, Sr., who owns his wife, Eliza, and their child. He bids Eliza good-bye, and leaving, meets his owner, who strikes him with a whip and has him branded. Shelby is in his library when he receives a letter telling him certain notes are due and offering to accept slaves in liquidation. Uncle Tom is working in his yard as Shelby and the lawyer enter. Shelby is compelled to sell Tom and Eliza's child. Eliza, who has overheard the conversation, determines to take her child and escape. She begs Uncle Tom to go with her, but he refuses, telling her he always will be faithful. Next day Eliza's escape is known, and Haley, who has bought her, gets a posse of men and starts to hunt for her. Harris offers a reward for George. George Harris, disguised as a Spaniard, escapes to Ohio, and is recognized by Phineas Fletcher in a bar. He promises to keep his secret. Meanwhile, Eliza is being hunted by men and dogs. George has told Phineas of his wife and child, and he promises to go to her rescue. Reaching a tavern near the river, he sees Eliza running, and hides her in a room while her pursuers are drinking. She gets away with the help of Phineas and joines her husband. Meanwhile Uncle Tom is sold and placed on board a steamer, where he meets Eva. Eva falls overboard and Tom jumps in and saves her. He is thanked by St. Clair, who buys him from Haley. At the St. Clair home Aunt Ophelia arrives and Topsy plays all kinds of tricks on her. St. Clair gives Topsy to Aunt Ophelia, and Tom to Eva. Later Eva falls sick and is dying. She gives a curl of her hair, and he kneels by her bedside. She dies and Tom comforts himself with his Bible. In a saloon Legree argues with another man and is going to shoot him. St. Clair tries to prevent this and is shot himself. Carried to his home, he dies. After his death all the slaves are sold, including Tom, who is brought along with Emeline and others by Legree. Legree finds Tom reading his Bible and sneers. Meanwhile, a warrant is issued for the arrest of Legree for the murder of St. Clair. At Legree's plantation Legree pesters Emmeline with his attentions. She rejects him and he has her tied to a post and whipped, to the horror of Uncle Tom, who is told to do the whipping. Tom refuses and is tied up and beaten by Legree himself to such an extent that he is taken away dying. Legree is arrested for the murder of St. Clair, and as Tom dies he sees a vision of Eva holding out her hands.

HIS VACATION (August 29).—Howard, a wealthy business man, has a number of clerks, among them Jim, and as it is vacation time, all are thinking of how they will spend their holidays. Howard's daughter, Gertrude, comes to see him and excites Jim's admiration, but to which she pays no attention, being a supercilious young woman. At the noon hour, when the other clerks have gone to luncheon, Jim falls asleep.

In his dream Jim finds himself at a beautiful spot in the country. Gertrude and Howard come in an automobile and are very friendly. Afterwards Jim takes Gertrude for a walk, Howard approving. They climb a rock to get a better view; Gertrude slips and injures her ankle. Jim goes for help. Some Italians, who are lurking in the neighborhood, see Gertrude and join her, and the idea of abducting her occurs to their wicked minds.

Returning with help, Jim meets a girl and a farmer who have seen Gertrude with the Italians, and hastens to rescue her. The Italians become aware of the pursuit. They bind Gertrude and place her in a boat. They also light a bomb, but in their hurry to escape, inadvertently put it in the boat with Gertrude. Jim finds Gertrude afloat in the boat and in deadly peril.

Jim dives from a bridge and swims after the boat; he reaches it in time to hurl the bomb into the water and rescues Gertrude. For this he receives the heartfelt gratitude of Howard, and needless to say, Jim's union with Gertrude is assured, and then—the clerks return from luncheon and waken him. At this happy moment Howard sends his secretary, with a notice that owing to the pressure of business, no vacations will be allowed to the clerks. Jim thinks sadly that only in the illusion of sleep he has had his vacation.

THE MYSTERY OF YELLOW ASTER MINE (2 parts—August 26).—Reed and Rosson are owners of the Yellow Sister mine. They have taken out enough gold to make the final payment, which is due. Both brothers love the same girl, Pauline, but she prefers Reed. Reed saves an Indian, Eagle Eye, from the drunken taunts of a half-breed, and the latter swears vengeance. The half-breed knows that the gold is ready for the final payment and decides to steal it. With the aid of his pal, a rustler, he kills the watchman and escapes with the gold. Then he kills Eagle Eye and puts the gold-sacks near him. The Indians, thinking the white men have murdered their brother, plan an attack on the mine. Pauline's faithful Indian girl servant learns of the proposed attack and warns the miner. The attack is made and Rosson rides for help. He returns with the cavalry as the miners are making their last stand, and, after a hot fight, the Indians are driven away. The halfbreed and his pal in the meantime, have camped in the desert. When the halfbreed is asleep his pal steals the gold and rides away. He is bitten by a rattlesnake and decides to risk discovery as a thief and rides to town for aid. A miner meets him and the rustler, now delirious from the poison, confesses the murder of the watchman and the theft of the gold. The miner is honest, and, after the rustler dies of the bite, carries the gold back to the mine just in time for the final payment to be made.

THE BETTER FATHER (2 parts—August 27).—Edward Curzon labors under the false impression that his wife has a strong affection for other men. One night Eleanor, the wife, receives a letter from her dissolute brother telling her that if he does not receive money from her that evening he will expose himself to her husband. Fearing nothing she goes into the garden, the suggested meeting place, and gives him the money. He is so pleased that he kisses her. This is seen by the husband. When he asks her for an explanation, she sternly refuses. The husband perceives a plan of revenge when he catches Al Bender, a burglar, in the library. For a large sum of money he has the burglar take away his little boy, Joe. When the wife observes the loss of Joe, she falls into a faint and the husband tells her that she will never see him again.

Bender begins to gamble with the money he received from Curzon and when the poolroom is raided Bender escapes, but his runner, Frank Morton, is captured. Morton is later released and is trailed to the rendezvous of Bender, who is captured by the police. Before Bender is taken away he manages to give Morton a stunning blow on the head, knocking him unconscious. Coming to his senses he finds little Joe; he decides to adopt him and act as his father.

Years later we find Joe a blossoming young schoolboy and his "father" a worthy quarryman. The father is badly injured by an untimely explosion and taken to a hospital. In order to support himself Joe sells newspapers.

Back in the home of Edward Curzon, a young baby girl clung to her mother's skirts as she looked at the photograph of her long lost son. A telegram to his wife announcing the death of her brother revealed to Curzon the true state of affairs and he tried hard to make restitution. Shortly afterward Curzon, acting upon the confession made by Bender to a clergyman that his son could be found with a man named Morton, inserted an advertisement to the effect that information was wanted concerning Frank Morton. The ad. caught the eye of Joe who, upon calling at the house given, found himself in the loving embraces of his real mother and father. When his other "daddy" was well again, he was taken into the Curzon household, and the little boy then had two fathers. Which was the better?

FOR THE FLAG (August 25).—Lieutenant Jack Bronson is partaking of a private dinner he is giving to his classmates when Captain Williams enters and addresses himself to the young lieutenant. It is quite evident from the way the captain is received and dismissed that the best of feeling does not exist between the two men. To the west where the troop of cavalry has been ordered, of which both men are officers, Captain Williams finds time to direct his anger at the lieutenant to the detriment of that young man. On one occasion when the wife of Colonel Graham succumbs to the charms of the lieutenant, much against the former's will, the captain, in telling the colonel of his wife's actions, makes it appear that the lieutenant ensnared her. Going to ascertain the truth of the captain's assertion, the colonel catches his wife in a very compromising attitude with the lieutenant, but for which the wife was responsible. The consequent effect of this incident is court-martial for the lieutenant and he is dishonorably discharged.

Sometime later Jack, who had gone to America and enlisted as a private in the Philippines, comes face to face with Captain Williams, who had been ordered there with his company. The captain recognizes Jack, but he denies his identity. A ball is given at the governor's home, where Jack has been assigned as an orderly to Captain Williams. The captain assaults a Spanish girl. Jack knocks him down and escapes. He and another soldier put out to sea. Several days later they are washed ashore in an emaciated condition. Jack proves his mettle when, in a skirmish with bolo men, he brings the captain and his company to victory.

FROM THE PORTALS OF DESPAIR (August 28).—John is of a jealous nature. One day he finds the neighboring Mexican half-breed, who is very fond of their child, talking to his wife and child and becomes very angry. He sends the Mexican away and warns his wife to have nothing further to do with the half-breed. A few days later John goes on a prospecting trip. His baby is taken very sick and dies. The shock turns the mother's mind and she leaves the baby in a box at the Mexican's cottage. She then wanders away to a camp where, after fondling the camper's baby, her senses return and she remembers that she left the baby at the Mexican's hut. She arrives there just in time to prevent her husband, who had returned home and intuitively went to the home of the Mexican to learn of the whereabouts of his missing wife, from doing bodily harm to the Mexican. Her explanation straightens the matter out and the husband and the Mexican become friendly with each other over the grave of the child.

JACK MEETS HIS WATERLOO (August 30).—Jack Kirken, a handsome young chap, visits his father's friend on a cattle ranch. His genial disposition makes him very popular with the girls of the little town and, when after a three months' sojourn he is appointed deputy sheriff, he is in the height of favor. Sallie Newman, the village belle, returns home from school in a distant city and learns all about the sheriff from the girls. Bill Acres, Sallie's old sweetheart, endeavors to renew his attentions and meeting with little success, of course, holds Jack's charms responsible.

Jack chided Bill about his jealousy and elicited a wager that he would not dare to kiss Sallie. Jack won his bet, but also secured a slap in the face and a reprimand on the head of it. Sallie regrets her fit of temper and so expresses herself to Bill. This further arouses the animosity of Bill and he plots against Jack. His plan is to place strange cattle in the corral of James Newman, Sallie's father, which would cause a breach between Newman and the sheriff and in this manner put Jack in disfavor with Sallie. The plot seems to work out to Bill's great delight, and he magnanimously offers to stand by Newman in an attack by the sheriff's forces, but the shrewdness of the deputy sheriff discloses the facts and Bill is taken into custody. Jack and Sallie become warmer friends than ever. Sallie offers to take back the slap, which Jack promptly agrees to return, but in a decidedly more pleasing manner.

ever and live in her old home. His career had consisted mainly of "one night stands," so the actor gladly withdrew from the footlights. In the small town the natives looked with awe upon the former actor. He appeared at numerous entertainments in classic roles and many maids, matrimonially inclined, set their caps for him. He married and his wife was fully aware of the treasure she had won.

He was a model husband until one eventful evening, he left the house to post a letter, telling his devoted wife that he would return in a moment. Hour after hour passed away and he did not return. His wife thought of terrible mishaps which might have befallen him and was in deep anguish. The husband really meant to mail the letter and return home at once, but a hospitable looking saloon caught his eye and he entered to have "just one good drink." He was soon very unsteady on his feet, but very happy and at peace with the world. He decided to have the time of his life, and he did, but a bitter awakening awaited him when he reached home and his disillusioned sponse beheld his condition.

THE SPIRIT OF ENVY (August 19).—The wife of the clerk was very happy with her husband and their child, although his earnings were small. But the wife's content with her surroundings was soon severely tested. An old schoolmate, who had married an officer in a large bank, called upon her, and, without intending it, aroused the envy of the woman less fortunately situated. The wealthy woman took her old friend to her rich home and treated her with every consideration, but every evidence of wealth which met her eyes made her guest envy her more and more, and aroused a spirit of resentment towards her husband.

The clerk was a subordinate in the office where he was employed, while the other woman's husband was one of the guiding hands of a large bank. The clerk's wife knew these conditions, and bitterly reviled her husband because he had not achieved success. The wealthy couple gave an elaborate reception at their home, and the clerk and his wife were invited. The woman did not want to go, but, urged by her husband, she accepted. They both felt very much out of place in the handsomely dressed throng, and wished themselves back in their home. The clerk's wife gazed at the commanding figure of the bank officer and wished that her husband was in his place. Suddenly loud voices were heard at the door, servants were brushed aside and policemen in uniform entered, followed by several men in civilian clothes. They surrounded the host, handcuffs were placed on his wrists and he was led off. He had betrayed his trust and the hand of law had seized him. The wife looked at her husband, slow and unsuccessful, but an honest man, realized that he would never do anything to bring shame upon her, and the spirit of envy passed away forever.

THE MEDIUM'S NEMESIS (August 22).—A wealthy widower, whose life had been placid and uneventful, suddenly found himself involved in a sea of trouble. While walking along a lonely street one day, a stranger bumped into him, then abused and struck him. The widower struck back, and was horrified when his assailant fell to the ground, apparently lifeless. A doctor who came running up, pronounced the man dead and the unfortunate slayer fled in terror. For several days he remained trembling in his home, fearing that the police were on his track, but seemingly he was not suspected. Then one day the blow fell. A letter was handed to him signed by "the Princess Ozeb," a spiritualistic medium, who occupied a house not far from his. In this missive he was told that "a terrifying message concerning you comes from the spirit land." The medium wound up by commanding his presence at her circle and in fear and trembling he obeyed. While there the spirit of his victim appeared and accused him of his crime. When he returned to his home he was on the verge of prostration and ready to obey any and all commands that might come from the spirit land.

Strange to say, the spirit did not call upon him to deliver himself to justice. The spirit, it seems, had dear ones still upon the earth and if their needs were supplied, justice would be satisfied. Finally a demand was made for $10,000, the money to be given the kindly Princess Ozeb, who would see that it reached its destination. This "the slayer" agreed to do, and on a certain evening appeared with the cash and handed it over, per instructions, while the spirit told him that all would be well. To soothe him, the medium summoned "the spirit of mercy and justice," but somehow her signals got crossed, for what really came out of the cabinet was a husky policeman. The widower's little son, it seems, did not believe in spirits, and aided by his friend, "the cop," had investigated with satisfactory results. The widower had not killed anybody, he had simply been the victim of a cunning plot. The swindlers were punished, while the big policeman, in addition to a reward, acquired the nickname of "the medium's nemesis."

MAJESTIC.

HOUSE HUNTING (August 17).—It is not the safest thing in the world for a woman to go house hunting alone. Pansy thoughtlessly takes this risk. She calls at a real estate office, gets addresses and keys of furnished houses for rent, one of which is in the suburbs. Rob, an employee of the office, is very much taken by Pansy, and she by him; he follows her out with admiring eyes. It is part of his duties in the renting department to go about putting up "for rent" signs on the houses. He reaches the house in the suburbs before Pansy does, places "for rent" signs in the yard and drawing room windows and goes on to the next house, where he finds that he has lost his hammer and remembers that he left it in the room at the last house. He starts back.

Meanwhile three tramps alighting from a passing freight have stolen some food and taken possession of the vacant house. Pansy when she arrives walks into their arms. They take her money and jewels and then match for her. One man wins and relinquishes the money and jewels to his partners. He lifts her into his arms, she fighting and struggling at this horrifying situation, and is just about to carry her into an adjoining room when Bob enters. A fight ensues. At his request Pansy leaves him in the room alone with the three tramps and he undertakes single-handed to keep them there while she summons the police. By the time they arrive, the windows are smashed and the room pretty well torn up. Bob is badly battered, but not defeated. The money is restored and the jewels. Pansy tries to thank Bob for her deliverance, and suddenly throws her arms round his neck—an act which he, needless to say, heartily subscribes to.

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE FENCE (August 19).—Eddie Foy, the famous comedian, has a son, Charlie, who is a second edition of his famous father. In this picture young Foy plays the part of a boy who, to gratify his curiosity, bores holes in various fences, to see what is on the other side. By doing so he becomes involved in a number of adventures. Furthermore, he kills time by giving an imitation of his famous father.

BASHFUL BACHELOR BILL (August 24).—Billy Garside was a young, good looking bachelor, adored by the fair sex. To escape their attentions he fled to the seashore, but the summer girls there, yearning for the society of eligible young men, pursued him, and in desperation he decided to make them think he was a married man. He purchased the photograph of a well-known actress, suitably inscribed it, and left it in a prominent position on his bureau.

A pretty chambermaid saw the photograph, and the news soon spread through the hotel that the supposed bachelor was really a married man. The girls gave Billy a cold reception, and he was really very glad that they thought he was married, except that the pretty chambermaid (who was really a college girl, working on her vacation) was greatly incensed at his apparent deception. Billy liked her and wished he could assure her that he was just a mere bachelor, but when he thought of the other girls he decided not to speak.

His deception was soon exposed. The original of the photograph arrived at the hotel with her husband on their honeymoon. The husband blundered into Billy's room and discovered the picture of his wife. Wrathfully he sought out the bachelor and demanded an explanation. Billy explained and the husband's sense of humor saved the situation. The feminine guests, furious at being fooled, snubbed Billy unmercifully, but the pretty college girl, when she learned the truth, forgave Billy, and soon another bachelor joined the ranks of the benedicts.

RELIANCE.

THE SMUGGLER'S SISTER (August 18).—Jim Stewart, a North West mounted policeman, is stationed on the Canadian border to stop whiskey smuggling going on in that vicinity. He is deeply in love with Bessie Dean, who returns his love. Bessie has a brother, Jack, who, unknown to her, is the leader of a band of whiskey smugglers that hide whiskey in bales of hay and in that way carry it over the border undetected. Jim and Jack become great friends. Jim receives a letter from headquarters that if he does not locate the smugglers, his position will be filled by another. The following day, Bessie, while out for a walk, is caught in a sudden shower and is forced to retreat into a deserted barn. Upon entering, she hears voices in the cellar and quickly pushing aside the hay she looks through a small hole and sees the smugglers at work, but Jack is not among them. She is overjoyed at her discovery and hastens away to tell Jim of the good news. Together they go to the barn. Meanwhile Jack has joined the men. Bessie goes to the hole and sees that her brother is one of the smugglers. She tries to prevent Jim's seeing, but he gently pushes her aside. The men are startled by the noise above, draw their guns and come up through the trap door. They get the "drop" on Jim. Jack, recognizing Jim, demands of the men that he be freed; the girl also offers her plea. They refuse and Jack and one of the men fight, Jack being overcome. Then the men bind Jim and Jack while the girl rushes out for help. The Smugglers make their get-away. In the meantime a lighted pipe that has been left in the cellar starts fire to the hay and the flames soon creep up to where the two men lie bound. Jack manages to free his hands, crawls to Jim, unties him, picks him up and staggers to the door with him. Bess and the men arrive, open the barn door as Jack staggers out carrying Jim. Jim is revived while Jack, severely burned, dies of his wounds.

COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENSE (August 20).—Hugh, a gay young man from college, is given a place in his father's law office in the hope that he will settle down and make something of himself. But one night, while at a roof garden with some friends, he meets Eloise Grizell, a singer. It is love at first sight. They marry and telegraph to his father. Furious at his son's marrying a cafe singer, the proud old attorney promptly disowns him, although it almost breaks his heart. For a time the couple are extremely happy and then their funds run low. Hugh becomes worried. Eloise tries to cheer him. She offers to go back on the stage, but he will not allow this. As weeks go by, his passion wanes, and, taking to drink and associating with evil companions, he soon loses every vestige of manhood. He is not even uplifted by the birth of his child. He soon deserts them and Eloise, ill and starving, is forced to get a position in a third-rate music hall, leaving the baby with a kind person. One night Hugh happens in to the music hall and, attracted by her grace, attempts to embrace her. She resists and a mutual recognition follows. He taunts her before all and she in fury stabs him with the stiletto she is using in the dance. She is placed on trial for crime, but withholds the name of her victim for the sake of his family. Her case attracts the attention of Lawyer Barrington, the great criminal lawyer, and he offers his services for the defense. As they have never met she does not ask his name and there is no recognition. He wins her case and she is acquitted. Getting her babe, she goes to the lawyer's home to thank him. Their identity is then discovered and he, furious at her confession, snatches the child from her and turns her out of the house. Eloise decides to end it all and goes to the park. She is about to end her misery when Barrington, repentant, restrains her. He tells her the babe needs a mother's love and that they will go far away from the scene of their common sorrow and start anew.

SUCCESS (2 parts—August 23).—Allan Brooks receives back his play from the managers. He returns to his studio convinced that life is a failure and that he will end it. Edith Mason, the girl who loves him, is an artist of no talent, but a strong and brave girl. While consoling him, her hand touches the pistol in his pocket and she gets it away from him. She tells him that success is not in money, but in a man's heart and soul. He does not agree and declares he would sell his soul for success. She is horrified. Then a letter is brought in stating that his manuscript had been returned by mistake and he should call at once. Bert, a young doctor, is in love with Edith, but she prefers Allan. The opening night of Allan's play arrives and the three attend the performance, which is a great success. Allan is called upon to make a speech and behind the scenes meets the beautiful leading lady. The manager and she try to urge him to go to supper with them, but he refuses, remembering the girl he left in the box. He returns to Bert and Edith and, getting an idea, he asks Bert to see Edith home as he has to see the manager. Edith is disappointed. The two go to a cafe and there see Allan in company of the leading lady and the manager. He merely nods to them. Bert sees Edith's distress and offers to take her home, where she sobs out her grief. Later, Allan decides to give a dinner in honor of all the successes of the town. Edith, unable to sell her pictures, obtains work in an art shop painting dinner cards, etc. Allan sends in an order for cards, which Edith is told by the manager to deliver to his house. She is forced to do so. She arrives at Allan's home and feeling faint is told by his secretary to sit down and rest. Meanwhile, the dinner is taking place in the next room. Allan then suggests that a failure be brought in to them as a contrast. The secretary, at a loss for a moment, remembers the girl outside and drags her into the dining room against her will. They all drink to the failure while visions of such successes as Edgar Allan Poe, Nathan Hale, Robert E. Lee and others appear on the wall. As the great cross of Calvary appears, one by one the guests steal out realizing that failure is not lack of gold and that these great men were once called failures. Allan looks at Edith, then falls across the table. Edith quickly summons Bert, who arrives almost immediately. They look at Allan; he is dead. Bert then leads her out and Allan lies alone in his deserted banquet hall.

THE GREEN SHADOW (2 parts—August 29).—Nell, the sister of Colonel Wilson's wife, is in love with Private Walsh, one of the post telegraphers. The colonel is fond of Nell, and his wife, being of a jealous disposition, is uneasy. The colonel discovers Nell's love affair, and takes from Walsh's desk Nell's photograph autographed, "Lovingly, Nell." Mrs. Wilson sews a button on her husband's coat and finds the photograph. She overhears snatches of conversation in which the colonel is trying to persuade Nell to give up Walsh and misconstrues them, and in a fit of temper accuses the colonel of being in love with her sister. The colonel is too hurt to give her an answer, and Nell is indignant. Nell and Walsh elope, Nell writing a note to her sister. Mrs. Wilson finds out for the first time the true circumstances, and begs her husband's forgiveness. The colonel goes in pursuit of the elopers with a squad of soldiers, and is surrounded by hostile Indians. A desperate fight takes place, and Walsh sees that the soldiers are being hard pressed. He climbs a telegraph post, taps the wire, and sends in a call for help. His figure on the top of the post makes an excellent target for the Indians, and he falls, badly wounded. Nell picks up his gun and holds off the Indians, who attack her, until the arrival of the troops. The Indians are badly defeated, though many of the soldiers are shot, and the horses tumbled to the ground. Walsh is tenderly carried to the fort and nursed back to health. For his bravery he receives a lieutenant's commission, which removes the social barrier between him and his wife.

THE MADCAP (2 parts—August 27).—James Brandon, sexton of Grace Church, and his daughter, Ethel, live together, the daughter being the organist of the church. The congregation, in appreciation of her services, offer to send her away to Boston to complete her musical education. She goes with a letter of introduction to Bishop Neal. The bishop asks her to stay in his home until she can be located in a boarding school. She accepts the invitation and meets his son, also John's college chum, Aaron Bront. At a fraternity gathering Bront insults Ethel, and John fights with him. As the result of this all dances are forbidden.

John and Ethel are married secretly. The college boys attempt to give a Halloween dance in

A HONEYMOON HOAX (August 5).—Leonard Smith and his bride set out for their honeymoon, Nancy's mother and father attending their departure by automobile for the ancient city of Tours. Just before the start Nancy's mother states that she will call up the couple at 10 that evening, by which time they should have arrived at the Grand Hotel, Tours.

On the road an unfortunate break-down occurs, and by courtesy of a passing motorist the loving couple are carried back a short distance to the nearby town of Blois. They decide to stay at the Blois Hotel until their car shall be repaired and Leonard Smith telegraphs to his bride's parents announcing the fact, and also to the Grand Hotel, Tours, informing the manager that he may let Room 16 for that night.

Meanwhile, things have been happening in Tours. Just previous to receipt of Smith's wire, a saucy looking drummer has asked for a room, only to be informed that all rooms are engaged. Smith's telegram, however, releases Room 16, and our commercial friend is duly ushered into the bridal chamber. He quickly orders the room cleared of all wedding knick-knacks, and prepares for slumber. At 10 o'clock he is aroused by a terrific ring on the telephone, and on answering same, learns that the parents of the bridal couple are calling from Paris. What an opportunity for some fun! An opportunity not to be missed. Therefore, he first imitates the bride's voice when talking to her mother, and afterwards the bridegroom's, when conversing with the father. His replies scandalize the doting parents and they are in a terrible fright until the receipt of Leonard's telegram puts them at their ease, and later we see the dear old folks lying in bed dreaming lovely dreams of their grandchildren-to-be.

SHOOING THE WOOER . (August 7).—Gerald King, a "masher" of advancing years, rides on the platform of a street car one morning and insists upon talking to pretty little Suzanne, a post office clerk. He follows her to the Martinville post office and discovers in what department she is engaged, and also finds out her name. Gerald then asked at the General Delivery window for letters which he knows cannot be waiting him, but whilst he excites the admiration of an elderly lady customer, his efforts at enchanting the lovely Suzanne meet with scant success, in fact he becomes such a nuisance that Suzanne only rids herself of him by slamming the window upon his fingers.

Gerald, however, is pachydermous as an elephant, and will not accept rebuff. He goes home and calls up on the phone in order to renew his protestations of eternal affection, but is again frustrated in his amorous intentions. Yet another idea occurs to the wily one, and he mails a blank sheet of paper addressed to himself at the Martinville general delivery. Gerald's valet has been awaiting an opportunity to "put one over" on his employer, and here occurs his chance. The valet calls at the post office an hour before the impressionable Gerald and fixes up a fine "josh" with Suzanne, whereby Gerald will be made to appear even more foolish than nature made him.

So when Gerald again calls for his mail, he finds Suzanne's face wreathed in smiles. She reaches for his letter, drops it, leaves her lily-white hand on the counter, which, when Gerald proceeds to stroke it fondly is quickly changed for that of a burly mail-carrier, who demands in fierce accents an explanation of Gerald's motive in placing a bunch of violets in the aforementioned burly fist. Gerald retires, disgusted, but is recalled by the smiling Suzanne, who hands him the forgotten letter. Seeing that his letter has been opened, he hopes to find a loving note therein from Suzanne. He gets, however, this message: "There is no fool like an old fool." And looking up from the reading of this proverb, he espies Suzanne and her fellow clerks derisively laughing at him through the post office window.

ASCENDING MOUNT BLANC (August 7).—Views of a party making the actual ascent of this famous mountain have a much greater interest than the usual scenic film. Commencing with the departure of the party from Pierre Pointue, at the altitude of 5,750 feet, chasms and glaciers interrupt a slow progress until a blizzard enforces a halt. At the Vallot Observatory, 14,000 feet above the sea level, the formation of clouds is wonderful to behold. Beautiful photographic effects are obtained, and the final snow-clad peak stands out in grandeur. The view of the cloud-banks drifting through the defiles and the pictures taken from above the clouds are full of beauty and interest.

TINY TIM AND THE ADVENTURES OF HIS ELEPHANT (August 12).—"Boys will be boys," runs the old saw, but to very few boys does the opportunity occur of separating an elephant from its owners and "painting the town red" in company with the pachydermous quadruped. The audacity of such a course appeals to Tiny Tim, who, in the course of his wanderings discovers an elephant of about his own tender years. Both are in the mischievous period of life, and what follows is typical of irresponsible youth.

Tracking down the encampment when night falls, Tiny Tim persuades the animal to join him, and, with the aid of a ladder, mounts his steed. Tiny Tim christens his new-found friend "John Willy," and together they set off on a voyage of discovery. Feeling rather hungry, they find the contents of a street vendor's stall an irresistible temptation. Over it goes, and the apples and pears disappear with unwonted celerity. A minute later the sentry at the armory gets a shock as the elephant romps past and Mr. Sentry goes through a great gymnastic stunt before calling out the guard.

At the corner of the next block, a "blind" man, comfortably ensconced in a push-cart, views their approach with great distress, and makes a prompt get-away. Tim takes the vacant chair and sticks the "blind" sign onto the ear of his companion. The sympathy they arouse brings in a shower of money, and presently they move along further. And now John Willy gets it into his head to "start something." Tim's motto is "Plenty of Push," and their progress through the busy streets is full of alarms and hairbreadth escapes.

During a breathing spell, hunger once more assails John Willy, and this time he seeks a lunch in a restaurant, with dire results to the fixtures and fittings and the well-laden tables. But an end must come to such capers as these, and it would seem that John Willy and his self-appointed keeper must suffer the humiliation of abject capture, when the appearance of a lady, who is a prominent member of the S. P. C. A., brings peace, food, and happiness to our duo of wanderers. The lady takes both of them home, where they are treated like millionaires, and they enjoy the good things of life to the very full.

THE LAKES OF SALZBURG, AUSTRIA (August 12).—Salzburg, a crown-land of Austria, lies on the northern face of the Eastern Alps. The southern portion of the country and its lakes form the subject of this film. Starting from the picturesque village of Ebensee, at the lower extremity of Lake Gmunden, one of the most beautiful lakes in Europe, we make our way by boat to the Chateau of Ort, which is built on an island.

Quite a different type of natural beauty is presented by the Lake of Hallstadt, which, lost in the mountains, presents a wild and melancholy aspect. The little town of Hallstadt is as curious to the tourist as it is pleasing, and the film as a whole is admirable.

HIS STOMACH AND HIS HEART (August 14).—Mr. Weighty is an epicure whose tastes are somewhat difficult to please. An excellent cook is the apple of his eye. Having been invited to dinner at the Graysons, he does ample justice to an excellent repast—and forms such a high opinion of the cooking that he actually desires to thank the cook. This worthy dame, gratified by the unusual compliment, then shows him a certificate which she, Mary Sauce, had received with the first prize in a competition. To the intense disgust of his host, he is afterwards discovered in the kitchen bribing the worthy Mary to resign her post with the Graysons and enter his service at an increased salary. The perfidious cook subsequently does so, and Weighty gets all manner of dainty dishes concocted for him. It seems, however, that she is not destined to remain in his service long, for her fame as a culinary artist has spread about, and the manager of an important restaurant writes to offer her the post of first cook at a salary of $2,000 per annum. The news comes as a shock to Weighty, who, for the first time in his life, does some hard thinking. He racks his brain to find some means of retaining her services, and comes to the conclusion that by marrying her, he would effect a permanent solution. Alas, "the best laid schemes of mice and men gang aft agley," as Mr. Weighty finds out the day after his marriage. His wife, in her newly established position, has come to look down on the profession of a cook, and has engaged an elementary amateur, whose products turn out to be as gall and wormwood to the superfine tastes of Mr. Weighty.

SOLAX.

A TERRIBLE NIGHT (August 27).—Mr. and Mrs. Brown, going out for the evening, leave their daughter, Vinnie, alone in the house. Later, her brother, Darwin, comes home unexpectedly. Having no door key, and ringing in vain (as Vinnie is afraid to answer the bell), he climbs in the window. Hearing noises downstairs, Mary thinks it is a burglar. Very much frightened, she locks her door and prepares to let herself down out of the window on bedclothes tied together. Tom comes upstairs and finds the door locked. Then, hearing her open the window, he in turn thinks her a burglar, and goes out of another window in pursuit. Mr. and Mrs. Brown return, and all kind of complications ensue, and they all finish up in the prison cell, charged with being burglars.

A CHILD'S INTUITION (August 29).—In a spirit of anger, Albert Wade leaves his parents, goes to New York and secures a good position. Years after, unknown to him, his father dies and his aged mother seeks the best means of subsistence. He later marries Helen Hoskins, whose mother makes her home with them. In later years Albert and his wife become society birds and Grandmother Hoskins has to mind their children. One day grandmother is taken suddenly sick and dies. The younger of the two children, who has always entertained a deep affection for grandmother, becomes very sick through her longing for the old lady. The doctor is unable to diagnose the case, but Louise, the older sister, intuitively perceives the cause of her sister's ailment, and, surprising the doctor and the nurse, she runs out into the street where she encounters an old woman selling shoestrings and matches. Telling the old woman her trouble and asking her to come home, dress in her dead grandmother's clothes and pose as her, the old woman agrees, and it is not long after that Louise has her at the bedside of her sick sister. The child at once becomes brighter and a decided improvement is noticed by the doctor who orders everyone out of the room, with the exception of the woman dressed as grandmother. Just then the parents arrive and are greatly surprised at the scene before them. When the doctor deems it pertinent for the parents and the nurse to enter the room, Albert recognizes in the old woman his aged mother. Joy and happiness with Louise is supreme, for she realizes that she has another real grandmother.

GREAT NORTHERN.

MISTAKEN IDENTITY (August 16).—Smith is a lawyer and at an invitation of several of his male friends takes a trip to the seashore to enjoy an outing for a day. Smith's wife is possessed of a jealous disposition and when he fails to show up at home at the regular hour the sleuth is given a description of his clothing and sets out to trail him. In the meantime, an intoxicated and seedy person has entered Smith's dressing room at the seashore and dons all his wearing apparel, as well as appropriating his wallet. The intruder then proceeds to have a good time with the money and is followed by the female detective, who mistakes him for Smith. Cafes and dance halls are visited and in the end the detective bundles the supposed Smith into a taxi and delivers him to Mrs. Smith. There is a scene of consternation and Smith unexpectedly appears upon the scene and demands explanations. These are forthcoming and Mrs. Smith promises to banish jealousy, while Smith quietly permits the bibulous person who had stolen his clothes to regain them as a souvenir and, in addition, hands him a little cash gift in consideration of the part he had played in bringing about more pleasant domestic relations.

LUX.

HIS CHANCE (Apgust 29).—John Malcomb has received a good education and has good prospects of becoming a very efficient draughtsman. Misfortune befalls his mother, who is entirely ruined by the failure of the Douth Western Mutual Supply Company, in which the whole of her funds are invested. The news of this calamity causes Mrs. Malcomb to become so ill that she is sent to the hospital, and thus John is left to struggle on alone. All his fine prospects are entirely ruined and he finds it impossible to obtain employment. He is obliged to sell the old home and take to the streets, so close does poverty dog his footsteps. After picking up a stray copper or so earned in the streets, John decides to become a servant. He enters the house of Mr. Dury, an engineer, and is soon engaged upon the most menial tasks. He falls in love with his master's daughter, but keeps his secret to himself. Dury has invested all his fortune upon an invention of his own. The idea is quite a good one, but there are in it several imperfections which require a more highly skilled man than himself to perceive. John becomes interested in the work, and his natural genius shows itself at last and paves the way to happier days.

FEATURES

ECLECTIC.

NERO AND BRITANNICUS (3 parts—State Rights).—In the opening scene, Britannicus is seen wooing Junia, to whom he is betrothed. He is the rightful heir to the throne of Rome. The emperor having died, Nero, assisted by his scheming mother, is proclaimed emperor instead of Britannicus, who is informed by his friends that the throne has been usurped by his treacherous stepbrother. Britannicus, alarmed by these tidings, hastens to Rome to claim the throne, and is met by Nero, who cunningly offers to let the people decide. Nero is hailed by the people as their ruler to the disgust of Britannicus, who informs his betrothed of Nero's treachery, and enlists her influence to recover the throne. He entrusts this letter for delivery to a supposedly loyal friend named Narcissus, who, instead of delivering the message to Junia, hands it over to Nero. Narcissus returns to Britannicus, and makes him believe that Junia has spurned his love message and no longer cares for him. Britannicus, terrified by this second misfortune, can hardly believe his senses, and is for the moment crushed. So as to separate the lovers forever, Narcissus now counsels Nero to have Junia abducted, and the fair woman in the dark of night is made a prisoner by Roman soldiers, and carried to the emperor's palace, where Nero is waiting. He gloats over the lovely form cringing before him in deadly fear, and a violent passion is aroused in the tyrant. Nero, enraptured by the charms of this virgin, decides to make her empress and thereby remove her forever from the influence of Britannicus, his hated rival. He writes Junia to this effect, warning her not to show any further affections to Britannicus, whose life is threatened in that case. Britannicus, after the first shock, begins to hope again, and is seen entering Junia's home to satisfy himself of the true state of affairs. To his dismay, he finds his beloved gone and her attendants unable to inform him of her whereabouts. Immediately he sees the hand of Nero, on whom he calls to demand for information about the woman that is dearer to him than his life. Nero receives Britannicus, and makes him believe that he is his true friend by introducing him into the presence of Junia, who occupies an adjoining room. Britannicus bursts out in a passionate appeal to Junia, while Nero is seen crouching in the background observing the two. Junia has noticed Nero hiding behind a curtain, and therefore dares not confess her love to Britannicus. She treats him coldly, causing her unfortunate lover to rush in dispair from the room. Nero, stepping out of his hiding place, again proposes to Junia, who spurns the tyrant, and in her extremity, whips out a dagger with which she threatens to end her life. Nero becomes frightened, desists and infuriated, leaves the room.

We now see Nero shaking off the influence of his mother so as to better pursue his career of crime. His mother's armchair thus far was placed next to his throne. He orders the same removed as an outward sign of his future independence. His mother just then enters and a quarrel ensues between the two. She denounces her son before the people as a usurper to the throne, and leaves the palace vowing vengeance. Outside she comes upon Britannicus, and immediately conceives the idea of using her son's hated rival as an instrument in her revenge. She informs Britannicus by letter that Junia still loves him, and offers her assistance in his fight to recover the throne. Narcissus, the spy, is present when Britannicus receives this note. He manages to obtain possession of it, and hastens to Nero to inform him of the impending danger. Meanwhile, Agrippina has introduced Britannicus into the palace, and brought the lovers together. Nero suddenly enters, and beholding the situation, his anger knows no bounds. But before the strong will of his mother, he cowers and slinks from the room. He begins to realize that more desperate means must be employed to destroy his enemy. In such a moment, Narcissus suggests to him the use of poison, and Locusta, the official poisoner, is called in and consulted. She concocts a powerful poison which is tried upon a slave who quickly dies, convincing Nero that this is the quickest way to rid himself once and for all of his enemies. Nero addresses a letter to Britannicus, giving his consent to his marriage with Junia, and fixing a day for the wedding, which is to be celebrated in his palace. We see next the wedding procession and Nero plighting the troth between the lovers. The wedding feast follows, at which the court is sitting around the tables with Nero and his mother upon a raised platform in the center. Nero rises and drinks the health of the newly wedded couple. He bestows a signal honor upon Britannicus by sending him a cup of wine to reply to the emperor's toast. Britannicus rises, and unsuspectingly drinks from the faithful cup. He has hardly touched a few drops when he falls down in great agony. A general commotion begins, during which Nero leaves his table and comes rushing to Britannicus, who is writhing on the floor dying. Agrippina, in a moment sizing up the true situation, accuses her son of the crime amidst the consternation of the wedding party. Junia, seeing Britannicus about to die, has quietly seized the poisonous cup and drinks the rest of the contents. She falls to the floor over the prostrate form of Britannicus, and the two, in a last embrace, die amidst the pandemonium around them. Unable to be together in life, they are joined in death, never to be parted again.

APPEARING IN:
SAPHO.

From "Sapho" to "One Round O'Brien" Is a Long Leap BUT— It takes a Lot of People to Make a World

And the film world is no exception. All kinds of characters and types must be deplicted to interest the people. The portrayal of a woman who makes you think—Sapho—or the portrayal of a man who makes you laugh—O'Brien—has each its place. For this reason, New Majestic gives Sapho four reels to tell her story, and O'Brien one reel. In the theatrical scheme of things

If You Wanted a Feature for a Whole Evening, You'd Pick "Sapho"

because of its purpose, strength and length. "One Round O'Brien," funny as he is, wouldn't do. Author Daudet's creation would be in call, whereas Arthur Mace's couldn't. One reel comedies aren't wanted for an entire evening's entertainment. They are in demand, though, on the usual diversified program. Where the show is of single reels, you can't get enough one reel comedies, and

If You Wanted a GOOD One Reel Comedy, You'd Pick "One Round O'Brien's Flirtation"

This first film of the new O'Brien series will make you idolize Fred Mace where you loved him before. We can't say the exact release date now, but just watch our ads a little while longer. Here are the exact dates of the New Majestics, though. SUNDAY, AUG. 17, "HOUSE HUNTING," a drama featuring Francelia Billington, the girl-the-critic-discovered. TUESDAY, AUG. 19, "THE OTHER SIDE OF THE FENCE," a comedy featuring little Charley Foy, true-son-of-his-father. SATURDAY, AUG. 23, "BASHFUL BACHELOR BILLY," a persecution film featuring Billy Garwood, young-man-afraid-of-girls.

1. PERFECT PROJECTION

PROF. HENRY PHELPS GAGE of CORNELL says:

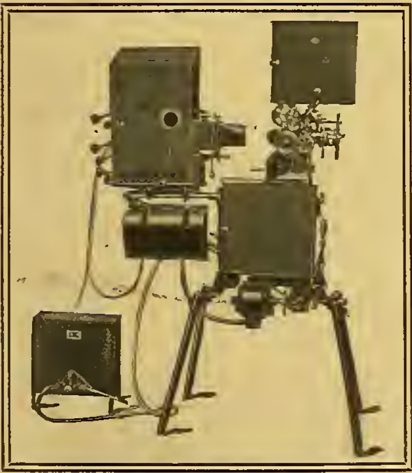
> "Run at normal speed POWER'S projects absolutely without flicker."

2. SAFETY FROM FIRE RISK

SAFETY ENGINEERING, JULY ISSUE, says:

> "POWER'S machines not only project pictures with wonderful precision, but safely as well. The latest POWER'S CAMERAGRAPHS are designed and built in such a way that hazard of fire is practically eliminated."



Our LOOP SETTER, our INTERMITTENT MOVEMENT are vital EXCLUSIVE features. They place POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH No. 6A in a class by itself.

THE NEW THREE

Sunday, Aug. 24. AN UNROMANTIC MAIDEN.

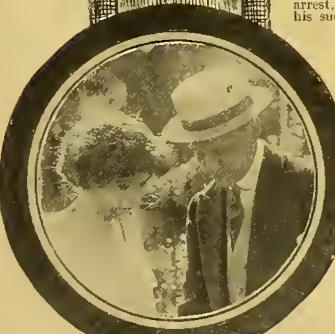
The new millionaire wanted to break into society; in his daughter he saw the way. He found a romantic count who needed the money, and arranged to bring a title into the family. But the daughter was unromantic and the match didn't go through.

Tuesday, Aug. 25. THE WARD OF THE KING.

In two reels, this tells of the days of the Fourteenth Louis of France when a noble could not contract marriage without the royal consent. A young noble fell in love with an orphan heiress, but as he stood in disfavor with the court, could not openly wed her, and their subsequent adventures are thrilling.

Friday, Aug. 29. A SPARTAN FATHER.

He was "The Honest Cop" and it broke his heart to learn that his little son had "gone bad." But he remembered his duty in the matter and arrested his son. The arrest, instead of being a blight, proved the lesson of the lad's life and cinched his success.



COMING! Sunday, August 24th, "An Unromantic Maiden," which is a satire that lovers ought to see.

COMING! All the time—to your lobby—THE THANHOUSER PLAYERPOSTER. It solves the posterless reel problem. Ask your exchange man the cost.

COMING! The Thanhouser Kid, in "The Medium's Nemesis" (Friday, August 22).

COMING! The Thanhouser Kidlet, in "A Spartan Father" (Friday, August 29).

COMING! The Thanhouser Twins (Triumphant Return) in "Life's Pathway" (date soon).

COMING! A staggering list of THANHOUSER CLASSICS in two and three reels and featuring such stars as Marguerite Snow, James Cruze, Flo La Badie, Mignon Anderson, William Russell, Harry Benham, David Thompson, Riley Chamberlin, the Kid and the Kidlet.

Broad as it is Long--and Deep Too!

That's one way to describe a week's output of General Film Service. Broad, because it covers the whole field of clever, imaginative drama. Long, because it offers splendid satisfying stretches of genuine enjoyment. Deep, because it contains the real depth of understanding and resource that builds up pictures of more than superficial interest.

Read over the stories listed here---seven of them! A service like this puts a different aspect on the whole moving picture situation in this country. Use it.

"The Jeweled Slippers"

Selig—Two Reels Released September 1st

A smuggling case that centers about two dainty slippers with a quantity of diamonds in the heels. An organ grinder's monkey scales to an upper window, snatches a slipper and widens the mystery.

"The Sign of the Black Lily"

Kleine-Cines—Two Reels Released September 2nd

The "Black Lily" gang of Paris is finally run to ground in spite of moving walls, disappearing floors and concealed hiding places in its den. The leader is surprised in the midst of one of his brilliant functions. Action? Well!

"The Sacrifice at the Spillway"

Kalem—Two Reels Released September 3rd

Suspense is carried through this story of a devoted woman's unselfishness. The turn of a lever in the spillway decides between happiness and misery for these two. It turns—the right way. A human story with a rattling climax.

"The Road to the Dawn"

Lubin—Two Reels Released September 4th

The town drunkard gets a surprise. Instead of his weekly jug from the city he receives a little girl, who has been sent away by her desperate mother. A mistake in the tags did it. A wonderful little story of marvelous human appeal.

"The Awakening of a Man"

Edison—Two Reels Released September 5th

A weak young man, beset with worries and determined to end his life, sees the portraits of his ancestors come to life. One by one he sees them perform braver deeds than he had ever dreamed. He stands up, an awakened man. An inspiration ingeniously conceived.

"While the Starlight Travels"

Essanay—Two Reels Released September 5th

An absorbing presentation of the theory that people may have more than one existence. Two lovers of the Cliff-Dwellers' age are reunited in Civil War time. A prophecy is fulfilled after the lapse of centuries. A story of unusual merit, staged with wonderful adroitness of detail.

"Women on the Warpath"

Vitagraph—Two Reels Released September 6th

A new and amusing phase of the "Votes for Women" agitation. The women of Jonesville, determined that the town shall go dry, bring about "a corner in trousers." Election morning finds the male voters without the wherewithal to appear in public. A few of them do—with dire results. It's a scream.

AN UNUSUALLY STRONG, PRETTILY TOLD KLEINE-CINES FEATURE
(In Two Acts) (For Release Tuesday, Sept. 9, 1913)

"The Mysterious Man"

One of those delightful mystery tales for which the House of Cines is Famous. You do not know until the last scene who is "The Mysterious Man"---and then to your amazement he proves the Father of The Girl the Detective Expects to Marry.

The situations are unique and extremely clever---the photography is par excellence, the acting right up to Cines' standards. There's a distinct "punch" in the story, carrying an air of mystery through a series of intensely interesting, baffling situations to a splendid climax!

How the "Mysterious Man" drove the resorters home in panic---how the Count Greville met his tragic end---how Maud's sweetheart-detective noted that the "Mysterious Man" never crossed his "T's" and how he finally ran down the Criminal only to find himself with the evidence against his would-be Father-in-law---all combine to make a genuinely sensational story well calculated to win the admiration of the most blase and tired picture-goers.

The Awakening of a Man

By Bannister Merwin

In Two Parts Released Friday, September 5th

When financial disaster overtakes Richard Wentworth, he goes to his fiancée's father to ask for help. The girl, shocked at his weakness, breaks their engagement, and Richard, feeling that all the world is against him, decides to end it all with a bullet. As he is in the act of shooting himself, there flashes before him the vision of his ancestors, stout-hearted men, fearless fighters who never flinched in times of peril. Inspired by the thought that the blood of these men flows in his veins, he takes a new grip on life.

Facts and Comments

WHILE all agree that the development of the multiple reel or feature has been bound to come and is on the whole an important step in the right direction, we cannot help remembering some of the peculiar merits of the single reel. The single reel made condensation the great virtue of dramatic kinematography. The power to compress and to condense is best cultivated by constant practice, and we cannot help admiring the ability of our early producers to crowd much action into little space. At a time when a thousand feet of film was considered the limit, the utmost attention had to be given to the possibilities of condensation. As a result, we had some notable instances of condensation. Take for example the old Shakesperian adaptations of the Vitagraph Company; we do not think they have ever been surpassed as samples of proper condensation. The wonderful Biograph reel which compressed all the essence of Browning's famous "Pippa Passes" into a thousand feet of film, typifies another case of the merit of the single reel.

With the development of the multiple reel, the tendency has been to stretch rather than to condense, and one reel in five is today a far more frequent occurrence than five reels in one. It is impossible to overrate the damage which excessive padding does to a proper development of dramatic kinematography. It has become a habit with certain manufacturers to pad two reels into three, or four reels into five; and instances are not lacking when a subject which would have been amply covered by two reels, has been stretched out until a length of five thousand feet was reached. It stands to reason that this padding is nothing more and nothing less than "graft," a hideous word to be sure, but one which just now will be most readily understood. The worst aspect in the case lies in this: The conscientious manufacturer who does not want to pad has trouble in competing with a cheap producer. The latter produces four thousand feet at perhaps seventy-five per cent. less cost than the reputable manufacturer, and is therefore able to sell at a ridiculously low figure. In this way, quality is threatened all around. The future of multiple reels depends on the ultimate triumph of quality. If the cheap, melodramatic "blood curdler" is to win, it will either drive the good features away entirely or lessen their number materially. On either theory the harm done to the industry at large and to its fair fame will be incalculable.

IN another part of this issue of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will be found some interesting data concerning a new plan of the Department of Agriculture. It is intended to use the films for the benefit of the farmers. The present stock of films particularly suited for this purpose is small and must be enlarged. We mention the fact here because it seems to us another indication of the growing importance of having educational films competently planned and competently directed for certain specific purposes.

THERE are various degrees of appreciation in the occasional tribute which is paid to the moving picture by the daily press. Most of this appreciation is of rather a qualified nature, and, as the chemist puts it, is seldom found in a pure state. As a rule, it is generally mixed with a large portion of such advice as is generally given to the erring. We are told that the moving picture is all right, but—that there is value in the moving picture, but—. Unqualified commendation by a daily paper of importance is therefore doubly welcome to moving picture men. The Buffalo Evening Times deserves to be enrolled on the list of honor, and its editorial opinion is of special significance because the editor and proprietor is a well-known man of affairs who has played no unimportant part in the political and journalistic history of the State of New York. Not only is the paper unstinted in its praise of the character of the great majority of pictures, but it does not hesitate to give credit to the exhibitors of Buffalo, of whom it says that "they have striven to lift up moving pictures rather than to make them merely mercenary money-makers. Moving pictures have taken a strong hold on the Buffalo people, and the quality of films and their freedom from vulgarity have been more than once praised." Speaking of the educational value of the picture, the paper says, among other thinks: "The valuable educative properties of the films cannot be overestimated. When most of the present adult generation attended the public school, knowledge of scenes in foreign countries was gained by rough woodcuts and dry geography." All intelligent observers will agree with the conclusion of the writer that "the greatest popular amusement development of a decade is the business of making moving pictures."

The Master of His Show.

By W. Stephen Bush

To what extent is the exhibitor of today the master of his show? To what extent do the exhibitor's ability and experience reveal themselves in his program? Has he, under existing conditions, a chance to choose his own program or to influence the selection of his program?

These questions suggest themselves to The Moving Picture World in connection with certain complaints received at this office from time to time. These complaints relate to broken booking agreements and irregularities in service, failure to live up to promises made or alleged to have been made by managers of exchanges, accompanied by the usual denunciations incident thereto, showing a great degree of anger and excitement on the part of the writer.

If the exhibitor, under present conditions, were entirely helpless or little better than the dependent of the lord in feudal times, these complaints, most of which we have no doubt are substantially just, would be entitled to the greatest sympathy and consideration.

The fact is that the exhibitor is not a helpless dependent any longer. If he is still suffering from oppression or drastic and despotic regulations, he is himself to blame. He has been in leading strings too long. Too many exhibitors are actually glad to have the burden of selecting a program taken off their hands. They have become used to this sort of guardianship, and in consequence have lost all initiative. They have gradually persuaded themselves that they are doing an exhibitor's full duty if they register an occasional protest and grievance in the office of their exchange. They look upon their allotment of the daily reels at first with hope, then perhaps with disgust and indignation, and at last they subside into resignation and indifference. This is not the way to build up and hold patronage.

The exhibitor cannot afford to leave the selection of his program to others, no matter how capable and well-meaning these others may be. It is his vital duty to do his own selecting and to make sure of the prompt delivery of his bookings. He must help himself and look upon the exchanges not as an end but as a means to his end.

How can he do this? He must give the matter his constant and personal attention. He must be willing to take pains and trouble. A conscientious exhibitor who takes himself and his business seriously must not be afraid of hard work. His program is his bread and butter. If necessary—and it is quite often necessary,—he must be at the exchange himself, make his demands and look after his bookings. Such tactics may make him unpopular at the exchanges, but they will insure the satisfaction of his patrons, whose money enables him to make a profit in his business.

No amount of human foresight can make sure of the future, but failures of advance bookings can be reduced to practically nothing by the exercise of more than ordinary care and diligence.

Take the matter of booking a popular feature which is in constant demand. A painstaking exhibitor will assure himself of the movements of such a feature in the three or four days immediately preceding the date for which he himself has booked it. If he has the feature for a Tuesday and the man that uses it on Monday is either known to be unreliable or lives a good distance away from the exchange, the careful exhibitor will take no chances but have his messenger on the spot the minute the man before him gets through with the reels. He will study the time-tables and make sure of the shortest route. By depending thus entirely upon himself he will have no time to waste in making complaints or bemoaning the cruel wherefore of the thusness. He will be paddling his own canoe, which is about the biggest pleasure that any real man can get out of life.

I have briefly mentioned just one point where the exhibitor is in a position to help himself. There is nothing to prevent him from applying this method to any and every problem that may present itself to him in the course of his business.

Nor is this a mere theory. I know of at least a score of exhibitors within easy telephone reach of this office who look to themselves for success, and nobody but themselves. In more than one instance this system of self-help has converted moribund show-houses into paying propositions. Hesitation will never gain you anything, nor will a constant fear and a timorous yielding to doubts ever benefit the health of the box-office. Work out a plan for good programs, say three or four weeks ahead, and then set out to get what you want. If you find one exchange too independent and inclined to be arbitrary, you do not have to go far to find another exchange which will be more accommodating. The man who cannot see the present liveliness of competition and who does not know how to profit thereby is in need of a powerful mental stimulant. He will never know there has been an earthquake until he sees the headlines in the paper.

The exhibitor who wishes to make sure of success in the future must win and assert his freedom by his own efforts. The columns of The Moving Picture World will be as useful to him as the latest time-table is to the constant traveler, but it's the reader's business to find the right train and to know whether he wants to ride in a coach or in a parlor-car, and how far he wants to go. Our advertising pages will keep him posted of all the vast film material that is now at his disposal (vaster and more varied than ever before), but the choosing must be done by himself as his own peculiar needs will dictate. Our news columns will apprise him of every important move within the industry, and thus aid him in determining his own best policy. The paper provides him with candid critical reviews, and makes it possible for him to form a fairly accurate judgment of every reel now on the market. It saves him the reading of a lot of verbiage from the press agents' foundry.

To be the master of his own show must ever be the highest ambition of every exhibitor who is made of the right material. Such mastery is the foundation of success, and there is no exception to this rule.

You cannot replace a man by a lay figure or make an automaton do the work of a natural human being. The only way in which an exhibitor can assert his individuality and take pleasure and profit out of his profession, is by using his own brains and his own taste and his own judgment. It is under a system of freedom such as we have outlined and such as now practically exists, that a real demonstration of the survival of the fittest, can be given. Ability, enterprise, energy, will forge to the front and the entire industry will be benefited. What good would it do to study and even to understand the needs and the tastes of your audience if you lack the means of meeting the needs and gratifying the tastes.

Be the master of your own show.

STUDIO SAUNTERINGS

This One Being an Account of a Voyage the Moving Picture World Man Made to the Place Where "All-Stars" Shine.

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

Mr. Lawrence B. McGill, Director of the All Star Company.

THE trip was so exciting that I hesitate to present the opening scenes for fear of being accused of leaning heavily on mechanical accessories in my story. It is not a loop-the-loop scenario but a mere recital of discovery under the guidance of one Harry Raver, now president of the All Star Feature Corporation. The official dignity that is now weighing heavily on his shoulders was too much of a load for his motor car to carry, the one in which he started from his residence in order to join me in his office at ten o'clock. His auto broke down or blew up on the way, and I suppose he disposed of the fragments to a junk dealer, for he soon after hired another car by the hour and reached Forty-second Street before one o'clock, making the entire trip of four miles in a little over three hours. Unless Professor Bertillon Adler's record of seven miles in five hours is allowed to stand unchallenged, Prex Raver is in a class by himself as a speed demon.

We now headed for the Battery, and the chauffeur displayed masterly ingenuity in the selection of congested streets to the exasperation of Treasurer Philip Klein. It was past lunch time, and the Goddess of Liberty was beginning to throw a shadow across the upper bay, when we reached the municipal ferry, only to learn that there would be another protracted delay while the fireman "wooded up" and the engineer and pilot went to see a man. The chauffeur smiled with malicious satisfaction and took a nap. Klein bought some indigestibles at a lunch counter, and while we were charging storage batteries of future trouble for our alimentary canals, Klein told of being snowed up in the Rocky Mountains, only to be raised by Raver with a reminiscential account of crossing the Andes. I thought of the Himalayas, but could not remember whether or not a higher peak than Mount Everest had been discovered since I studied geography, and I decided not to call. Klein suddenly threw a cruller with such deadly aim that our night-hawking chauffeur both woke up and cranked up—a traffic-squad cop, engaged in holding up the elevated structure, had signaled that we must get a move on. We moved a little, stopped long enough to make a small contribution toward the campaign fund for the next Tammany Mayor and finally rolled aboard.

Quite unexpectedly, the boat neither sank nor ran on an uncharted reef. She sailed majestically over much the same course taken by old Commodore Vanderbilt when he laid the foundation of family millions carrying passengers from the then-ideal residence section, Staten Island, to Manhattan Isle, between four and five miles, for whatever he could shake out of them in the way of ferry toll. We landed at Saint George, skirted an approach to the Narrows, ran up Fingerboard Road at Fort Wadsworth station, passed romantic Fox Hill Villa, and emerged on an open plain on the other side of the hill, a spot admirably suited to military maneuvers. The military was not so much in evidence as a gaping crowd of women and children in country fair attire, all intent on watching the costumed ladies and gentlemen of the All Star Feature Corporation rehearse and act.

It now developed that we had been carrying a veritable treasure, a splendid camera, costing almost any sum you are not accustomed to carry in cash, especially imported for the purpose of photographing the action of large bodies of troops. It is a magnificent instrument of combined large scope and accuracy of detail. President

Scene from "Arizona."

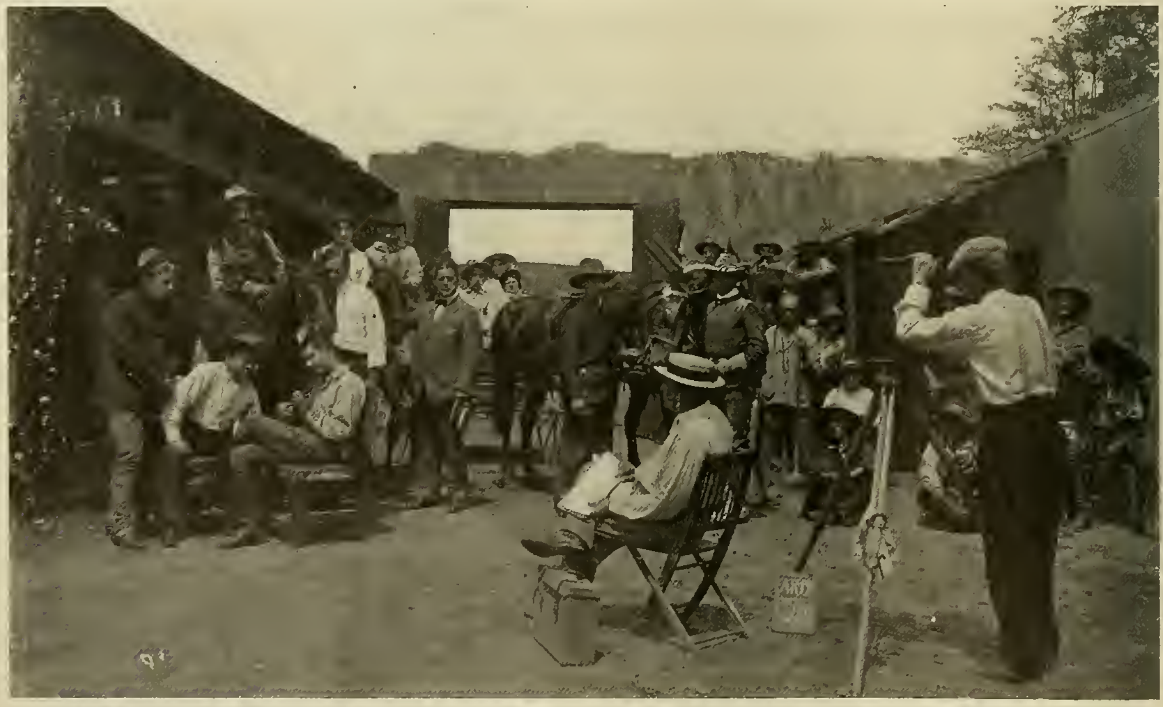
Raver would not allow it to pass from his hands while we were exploring the field, on foot, until we came upon Director Lawrence McGill engaged in taking an exterior. I was genuinely glad to meet amiable and philosophic "Larry" again. He was the dominating spirit of the place in the absence of the illustrious playwright—Mr. Thomas had gone home—and will probably be the controlling influence to the end, whenever it becomes time to select scenes and guide the action that is to be recorded and preserved by photographic means. He is a born director with a tremendous capacity for hard work.

The director's lot is a whole lot. The playwright must of necessity be a man of constructive imagination and special aptitude, must be able to create and select what is dramatic and of the highest value, eliminating the non-essentials, but he is master of his own time and volume of industry. The greatest benefit he receives from a thorough knowledge of technics is that of knowing when not to use them. The director is always under pressure and in a struggle perpetual with irritating limitations. He must not only have a general picture sense but ability to concentrate his entire attention upon each scene, not for a moment forgetting its relation to others. In addition to a number of special qualifications, he must have exhaustless patience and a cart horse capacity for pulling single or double with all his strength. Director McGill is just such a man. If he has a temper, he sleeps on the things he thinks of saying and lets them go at that.

The philosophical director is engaged in making "Arizona" ready for screen presentation, and has his charming wife, Gertrude Shipman, in the cast. She will certainly strengthen it—I cannot forget her admirable impersonation of Camille. Many of the other performers have played in the stage production, but I never had the pleasure of seeing it and cannot pronounce on their merits. I came across a contrast of character in Cyril Scott, and Miss Gail Caine, Broadway stars, that was brought out by the unsolicited presence of an audience during these open air rehearsals. He is a man of acute temperamental sensitiveness and easily disturbed during the experimental trials of scenes preparatory to their performance by the uninvited spectators, and this is possibly due to the fact that stage rehearsals are given in strictest privacy Miss Cane seems to enjoy having this gathering of neighboring women and children in front of her—they keep her up. She is young, very attractive in appearance and looks like a comer in the motion picture field. Modest and frank in conversation, unassuming in conduct on all occasions, she gives spontaneous expression to her personality with the enthusiasm that has characterized some of the best performers of her sex in moving pictures. I miss my guess if she does not win. There is, in fact, a delightful naturalness about all the ladies in the cast who came under my observation. They seem to have thrown off that old theatricalism that was once regarded as an art.

Unavoidable delays on the trip to the studio grounds prevented my meeting Augustus Thomas, and it is not of particular interest to examine the fibre of a man through the varnish of praise given him by friends and business associates. What an author has done in one field of action does not entirely settle what he can do in another, and what a man has been is of less importance to those interested in moving pictures than what he is or is going to be. Drama of the stage has been a commodity and had its closed doors quite as well as moving pictures—it has possibly suffered even more from decadent forms of commercialism—and it is very far from having reached the ultimate in either motive or construction. Talented critics of the stage performance have long lamented that no drama of democracy has appeared—I do not see how it can be expected until a true democracy arrives—but Mr. Thomas aimed at life as he understood it and his growth was towards dramas of universal appeal rather than those of his early productions of national or sectional interest.

What is the use of discussing the question of his past achievements? Genius is in every man of soul and feeling.



"All Star" Players Producing Scene in Augustus Thomas' "A izona" Under the Direction of Lawrence McGill.

It is in a prison, eternally striving to escape. That it gets release is due to such a total of conditions that they are not to be enumerated in an article of this kind. That it escapes and finds free expression once in a while is one of the greatest joys known to humankind. When it once gropes its way out of bondage it is capable of growth far beyond its best performance. It reaches out as naturally as the tendrils of a flower for new opportunity. The freeman who is no longer a slave to his body, who is emancipated from its control, may turn his creative mind to any field, concentrate upon any new effort, utilize everything the storehouse of his experience provides, make new forms of old materials and accomplish results far beyond past performance.

Evidence of this was shown when I caught a glimpse of the author's script. He had devised, apparently of his own accord, a form of working scenario already employed by some of the best producers of photoplays in strict accordance with a system slowly evolved in other cases. A man of such sure methods will surely arrive at his destination.

I can not prejudge a play not yet ready to be thrown on the screen—the completed product must be studied from many points of view to forecast the effect on mixed audiences in little theaters all over the world—but the day of accidents in screen presentation is soon to be a thing of the past. Only those qualified to write and produce screen dramas will attain success. Conditions are phenomenally favorable for plays of merit exist and one dependable source from which they may be expected is the author of ability proven in other, similar, creative fields. This first release of the All Star Feature Corporation has many things in its favor at the start, notably the author of Arizona. His established reputation has a high value at the outset—it will be a drawing card—and it will probably become an immediate source of profit, but its chief value, from my point of view, lies in what it must naturally lead to when Mr. Thomas has put this first experience behind him.

I lingered after President Raver's departure to get other impressions, and they were pleasant ones, like those of visiting a big and jolly family at the week's end. That is what they are, these companies operating in the open, a lot of good fellows and charming women engaged in congenial work. Almost my last thought at parting was that those who find their way to attractive and lucrative work, who ply their interesting vocations with a certain amount of talent, are getting the best use of their native abilities and enjoying a state of society that is as near ideal as any we know of on earth.

Films for Farmers

Interesting Plans of the Rural Organization Service.

By W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is to tell of another practical instance of the ever-widening sphere of kinematographic usefulness.

There were, but a few months ago, two students at Harvard College. One of them hailed from Kansas. It will be easily believed that social problems and innovations of all kinds had a charm for the Kansan, for the people of Kansas cannot bear the thought of being outstripped by anyone in the race for social betterment. The other young student who enters into this story was a native of New Hampshire. He, too, was keen, practical and sharply observant of everything that went on around him. These two students, Clyde I. Davis, from Kansas, and Roger Eddy Treat, from New Hampshire, had been deeply impressed with the educational possibilities of the moving picture screen. Both felt that they had a mission and a message, and it was perhaps while casting about for means to deliver and promulgate their mission and their message that their interest in moving pictures took its rise.

Davis and Treat conceived the idea that the farmers all over the country would be gratefully interested in moving picture demonstrations of the various branches of their chosen calling. Both the young men were hearty admirers of Prof. Thomas Nixon Carver, a professor at Harvard University who has attained some fame as a writer on sociology.

One day in the recent past they took their tongues into their hearts and calling upon their revered teacher they told him of their plans, and the mission on which they felt and of the methods by which this mission could be made fruitful. Prof. Carver saw the practical side of this thing at one intuitive glance and entered into their plans. As a result there has now been organized within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture a bureau known as the Rural Organization Service. The purpose of this organization is to help the farmer with films and lectures that will be useful to him.

Just now the enterprise is in a purely experimental stage, but it has the backing of Prof. Carver, who has recently been called to Washington to assist the Department of Agriculture, and it has back of it the enthusiasm, energy and perseverance of these two young gentlemen, Davis and Treat. A short trip through New Hampshire was their first step, and though the work done on that occasion was necessarily limited in its scope, there was every indication of success.

Davis and Treat were called to Washington last week, and were appointed special field agents of the Rural Organization Service. They are now making preparations for their second trip, which will be on a more ambitious scale and will take in practically the entire South. If the second experiment proves as successful as the first, it is the intention of the Government to extend the use of the films for the farmers throughout the whole country. It may be mentioned in passing that Asst. Secretary Galloway is very much interested in the project, as are all of the officials in the department.

Mr. Davis, on his way from New Hampshire to Washington, stopped in New York and paid a visit to the offices of the Moving Picture World. He said that at the present time there were comparatively few films available for their purpose. He mentioned Edison's Cabbage Caterpillar, The House Fly, Fruit Growing and Bee Keeping. Lectures accompany the pictures.

It is proposed to work in co-operation with the state agricultural colleges which exist in almost every state in the Union. No part of the territory will be neglected nor slighted. The special field agents will carry with them the necessary calcium apparatus all the time, because it often happens that the exhibition takes place at a distance of ten to twenty miles from the nearest railroad. County Fairs and Farmer's Conventions will receive particular attention.

It is expected that from these small and modest beginnings there will grow up a most important branch within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. The Department realizes that the present limited output of films which are specially suitable for the purpose of teaching farmers must in time be supplanted by a system of regular releases issued on a scientific basis and directed by competent men. If no other means can be had of producing such films, the Government will take this work into its own hands. There is little doubt but that Congress will give the plan its substantial support if results can be shown.

For the results we may trust Davis and Treat.

EASTMAN COMPANY LOSES PATENT SUIT.

Buffalo Court Decides That Kodak Concern Has Infringed on Rights of Hannibal Goodwin, Deceased.

After eleven years of litigation between the Eastman Kodak Company, of Rochester, N. Y., and the Goodwin Film & Camera Company, which is in turn controlled by the Ansco Company, of Binghamton, N. Y., a decision affecting the patent rights to the modern photographic film in all its forms has been handed down by Judge John R. Hazel, of the United States District Court of Buffalo. By this decision the Eastman Kodak Company is declared to be an infringer of the Hannibal Goodwin patent, and is liable for the accrued profits which it has reaped since September 13, 1898, and which are variously estimated at from five to twenty-five million dollars.

The basic formula for the production of celluloid photographic film was discovered and patented in 1887 by the Rev. Hannibal Goodwin, who for twenty years was Rector of a Protestant Episcopal Church in Newark, N. J. He was an amateur photographer as well, and interested himself in fulfilling the demand at that time for a substitute for glass plates in photography. The result of his work in this direction was a formula which has always remained as the basis of whatever celluloid photographic film has been or is now being made. Litigation has been protracted for eleven years on various technical questions involved in the manufacture of the film, but the Court has held that although there may have been some variations in the process of making, the original chemical combination of basic ingredients is still the same as that patented by the Rev. Dr. Goodwin in 1887.

This decision is fraught with tremendous importance, particularly for the Eastman Kodak Company, which for the past dozen years has produced what is estimated to be eighty per cent. of the world's output of celluloid film. It is expected that the usual injunctions following such a decision will be invoked, and that the Ansco Company of Binghamton will enjoin the Eastman Company from manufacturing this product. However, inasmuch as the Eastman Company controls such a great portion of the market, the injunction will be conditional, whereby it will be allowed to continue operations under obligations to the Ansco Company.

The decision stated further that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree with costs, an injunction, and an accounting covering the process and product of the patent. Dr. Goodwin, the original patentee, has been dead for many years.

"The Mysterious Man" (Cines Kleine).

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

In the two-reel Cines-Kleine feature, "The Mysterious Man," that will be released by the General Film Company, September 9, many will recognize several of the photoplayers who took prominent parts in the production of "Quo Vadis?" Among these are Charles Maestro, notable for his great characterization of Chilo; Miss Leah Guinchi as Lygia, and J. Gizzi as St. Peter. Mr. Maestro, in this instance, has been assigned the titular role (Professor Mortimer), Miss Guinchi appearing as his daughter Helen, and Mr. Gizzi as A. Mossler, one of the victims of the man of mystery.

Scene from "The Mysterious Man" (Cines-Kleine).

The story smacks of the Sherlock Holmes type, and the mystery is well preserved from unraveling until the final scene. The detective impresses one as being a very pompous and self-important fellow whose work, except in the setting of the trap for the wrong door near the close, does not entitle him to any particular consideration. Just why this detective's observation, "These marks are of a small, well-shaped shoe," is considered worthy of a subtitle is not clear, seeing that the prints of a small, well-shaped shoe in the shrubbery assisted in no way whatever in the apprehension of the criminal. Nor does the fact that this detective persists in smoking a briar pipe in and out of season contribute in any degree to his keenness as a sleuth. Indeed, at times, it seems offensive and in decided bad form; for example, when he introduces himself to the commissioner of police and puffs the smoke in his face during the conversation.

The production can boast of several fine interiors which bear all the marks of skillful and artistic stage direction. The exterior views have also been well chosen. It seems to me that the director could have succeeded in telling this story with greater clearness. In a detective story there is more or less complexity, to relieve which various artifices and devices must be employed. A well placed subtitle often carries the story where the pictures fail. The great danger in the production of such plots lies in the tendency of the director to omit placing himself in the position of the spectator, who knows nothing about the story or plot. I am of the opinion that, when I am unable to follow the pictures intelligently, the director is at fault, either through an oversight, or because he has not devoted sufficient study to the work on hand. In some cases the "cut-out" man must be held responsible.

As the mysterious man of the story, Mr. Maestro gives convincing proof, if that were now necessary, of his resourcefulness and strength in heavy character parts. In the man of mystery we see him as he is, physically, in real life. While not massive, he is a man of fine physique and build. To have succeeded so well in the part of "Chilo" shows him to be a master in "make-up" and simulation. Miss Guinchi as Helen Mortimer is an adorable little creature, and her physical charms sway one still more strongly than in the part of "Lygia."

Professor Mortimer and his daughter Helen go to Clear Springs, a health resort, for a short stay. There they meet old acquaintances, and Helen joins in the merry whirl of the fashionable throng.

One evening the professor is suddenly taken ill, in the presence of other guests. Count Desbro, one of the guests, receives a note that same night, demanding a certain amount of money under threat of the loss of his only daughter in case he refuses. He pays heed to the strange request and leaves the resort with his family immediately afterwards.

A few days later another rich guest receives a letter from the mysterious man demanding $2,000 on pain of death. He refuses, and is assassinated from ambush a few days later.

Helen's old sweetheart, Robert Marsh, who is in the detective business, arrives and immediately plans to catch the assassin and blackmailer. This he does in the long run, the mysterious man turning out to be Helen's father, Professor Mortimer.

Flickers.

WHAT do you think of his looks? He is a pretty nifty looking young fellow, isn't he? Our friend this week is Watterson R. Rothacker. There may be a few of the late arrivals in the business who do not recognize him, but I dare say very, very few of those connected with the industry previous to two years ago do not claim a speaking acquaintance with him. He first came into the limelight while Western manager of the "Billboard," and it was mainly through his untiring efforts and wonderful personality that the Chicago office of that paper was so successful. About two years ago Rothacker resigned his position with the paper and organized the Industrial Motion Picture Co., the first company of its kind, for the purpose of taking motion pictures for industrial and advertising purposes.

I had many pleasant times with Rothacker while in Chicago last fall, and I know that anybody with the time to visit him at his office in the Boyce Building, Chicago, will enjoy his little talk and cigar.

Our old friend, "Larry" McGill, late director for the Reliance Co., has established himself with the All-Star Feature Corporation, as director of productions.

J. Parker Read, Jr., with the financial assistance of "Doc" Willat, has launched another big feature called Victory, in five parts. Haven't seen the picture, but understand it is "there."

Have you been up to see Streyckmans, at 110 West 40th Street, since he started his new enterprise? What do you think of him? Here he quietly edits his house organ, and all the time he is pulling something, then of a sudden springs it without warning. Well, Strick, go after it. Pasquali is a good brand, and if there is a piece of money in it, there is no doubt but that you can pull it out. My best wishes.

I presume that now since Harry Raver is associating himself with the big noises in the amusement world that he will fall for that gasoline odor that only a sixty horse-power car possesses, and give his little Ford away.

By JAS. S. McQUADE

We have heard recurring, spasmodic cries for quite a time past for educational pictures. Now they are heard in one city and then in another, and soon they die out in silence. Public school authorities here and there grow enthusiastic for a moment or two and then grow lethargic. Colleges and universities betray a like tendency to become warm and lukewarm. Similar conditions prevail at times among the great army of exhibitors. The forces from all these sources have accomplished little or nothing in bringing the desired conditions within nearer reach.

Why is this?

Without a persistent, co-operative exertion of these forces, the educational picture as an established factor in our civilization is still far off. Chicago by herself, or New York, or any of the other great cities acting alone, will fail to bring about conditions that will recommend the educational field to film manufacturers. There must be a market in sight before the manufacturers will invest hundreds of thousands of dollars in the production of educational films. In other words, a market confined to New York, or Chicago, or any other large city, or to any isolated section—whether north, south, east or west—will not be sufficient to warrant manufacturers engaging in the output of educational subjects. The educational film must be able to go out on its rounds and earn the cost of its production and the profits connected with the trade, just as other films are now doing.

Let there be concerted action among public school authorities throughout the length and breadth of the land; concerted action among colleges and universities and preachers also, and the cause will be won. The demand must first exist in the proper form before the supply can be furnished.

Military Educational Moving Pictures.

"There was exhibited privately in Chicago on Thursday, August 7, a set of moving picture films of a part of the United States Army at work, which should be the beginning of a highly important and sorely needed educational movement. They showed, mainly, a battery of horse artillery in battle action and entraining to proceed to the front. They showed the work as it actually is, without posing or romantic distortion.

"These films are the result of a suggestion of Major General Leonard Wood, and were made at Fort Riley under the direction of Major Thomas J. Dickson. It is hoped to extend the series to all arms of the service and to cover all the work and training of the man that makes him a real and efficient soldier. It is hoped thus to bring home to the public mind a comprehension of what an army really is and how it must be made, and that it positively cannot be improvised.

"With all their natural intelligence and all their schooling, the great body of the American people are profoundly and dangerously ignorant on that subject. The average American man is brave and patriotic. He is willing to fight for his country if need be. But he is under the delusion that when the crisis comes about all that needs to be done is to give him a gun and set him before the enemy. Because of the prevalence of that popular delusion we have wasted thousands of lives and millions of money in every war.

"It will probably be some time before the moving picture 'Story of the Soldier' will be ready for public exhibition. Military experts are not photographers, and photographic experts are not military officers. Former efforts to get 'the real thing' failed for this reason. It was possible to obtain the interesting and accurate set of films shown on Thursday because Colonel W. N. Selig, head of the Selig Polyscope Company, with great public spirit, turned over his whole plant, apparatus and operators, to Major Dickson, and the work was done from strictly military viewpoints.

"The pictures shown were illuminating, even startlingly so, to the laymen who saw them. For instance, few of them realized that to start such a force of artillery required from seven to nine railway trains, of twenty-five cars each. And it takes from three to five years to train the men and horses up to regular army standards of efficiency!

"There is a fact which should be soberly digested by all who contend that the United States doesn't need an adequate army, because of the 'millions of volunteers' who would 'spring to the front' as soon as war broke out.

"Undoubtedly they would 'spring' and unquestionably if they met a trained hostile force those of them who didn't run away would be simply slaughtered. That's a grim and grizzly fact worthy of note by congressmen especially."

The foregoing is an editorial from the Inter-Ocean of August 9, and impressively shows the educational value of moving pictures from a military standpoint. Many of our congressmen can well afford to become boys again and view these pictures. Millions may be saved by the presentations, both in blood and treasure.

High-Class Photoplays for New Grand Central.

William Sievers has signed a contract with the Famous Players Company of New York, of which Daniel Frohman is the consulting head, whereby many stars of the stage will be seen exclusively at the New Grand Central, St. Louis, in moving pictures. These films will introduce Mrs. Fiske, Mrs. Langtry and Henry E. Dixey.

Mr. Sievers also has arranged for the exhibition of the famous Beverly B. Dobbs pictures of the frozen north. These were first presented Monday, August 17, beginning a season of advanced moving picture exhibition.

Mrs. Fiske will be seen in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," from the novel by Thomas Hardy. "Tess" is in five reels and is announced for September 1. "Caprice," which has been staged in four reels, with Mary Pickford in the title comedy role, goes on ten days later.

Henry E. Dixey will appear in the films in a modern detective comedy September 20. Mrs. Langtry will appear in a two-reel photoplay entitled "His Neighbor's Wife," October 10. Mr. Dixey will "go on" again October 20, in another detective play.

The policy of the theater in the future will be to stage only the big reels as rapidly as they are released. Since the unprecedented success of "Les Miserables," the management has been seeking similar notable attractions and the contract with the Famous Players Film Company will enable the Grand Central to stage some of the best productions.

Moving Pictures Save Day for Sir Knight Vallery at Denver.

At the recent conclave of the Knights Templar at Denver, moving pictures saved the day in providing a horse of the purest white for Sir Knight Geo. W. Vallery, chairman of the triennial committee Knights Templar. The horse committee searched for two months prior to the conclave for a perfect white horse for Sir Knight Vallery to lead the monster parade of 12,000 knights. Many white horses were found, but none pure white, none of the build and whiteness of White Roger, owned by Milton Marshall, 82 years old, who lives in the town of Littleton.

"That's the horse we want," said one of the committeemen, as soon as his eyes lit on him.

Marshall shook his head when the men asked him for his horse. Mrs. Marshall was rather indignant and gave the committeemen a defiant glance which spoke more definitely than a verbal refusal.

"Say," and a happy thought struck the committeemen. "You'd like to have Roger's picture, wouldn't you? I mean moving pictures, the kind that you pay a nickel to see. Why, all the moving picture people will be here and they will take Roger's picture prancing at the head of all the Sir Knights. And his silver hoofs will show, his trappings will show, and Sir Knight Vallery will be riding him and he won't have a whip either. And—"

"Say," exclaimed the old man. "You don't mean to tell me that Roger would be in the movin' pictures, do ye?"

"Yes, and you can see him at any picture show and we'll see that you get in free to see him."

"Say, Ma," and Ma was beginning to waver now. "Say, that sounds purty good to me."

"Yes, Pa, I believe it would be tolerable nice to have Roger in the picture shows. I guess it's all right."

And so it came about, according to the Denver Republican, that Sir Knight Vallery got a perfectly white horse for his mount, while old Marshall sat in the stall by his pet at nights whispering to him, "You're goin' to be in the pictures, Rog; you're goin' to be in the pictures."

A Realistic Moving Picture.

"C. W. T." treats readers of the Chicago Tribune to the following laughlet on realistic moving pictures:

"This, ladies and gentlemen," said the showman, "is a moving picture of an old time steamboat mate in action."

"But he doesn't seem to be doing anything," objected a man in the audience, who suspected that the picture was a fake.

"Don't you see his lips moving?" sharply retorted the showman. "He's swearing to beat the band!"

Chicago Film Brevities.

C. H. Shook, piano player at the White House, Western and North Avenues, paid a visit to the World office last week. Mr. Shook is an ambitious young man, and is determined to shine as a player of the piano and organ in moving picture theaters. He is now taking a summer course at the American Conservatory of Music, this city, in pipe organ practice. The White House is owned by Frank Holub. It seats 300 people and offers programs of licensed service at five cents. It has been open all through the hot summer, and business has been remarkably good.

Felix Greenburg, owner of the Lyceum Theater, and Charles Nathan, owner of the Orpheum, in Peoria, were in the city and called at the World office last week.

The Parkway, North Clark and Diversey Boulevard, reopened Wednesday, August 13th, and has since been showing to phenomenal business. Miss Martha Butler, the well-known soprano, has been engaged for a run.

A. Buchanan, of Miles City, Mont., called at the World office last week. Mr. Buchanan produced recently the "Miles City Round-Up" for the Imp. These pictures are said to be remarkable, both for novelty and interest.

James A. Williamson, of the Williamson Kinetograph Company, Ltd., London, Eng., spent a few days in Chicago last week, during his present tour of America. Mr. Williamson is a warm friend of Harry Spoor, European representative of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company. Mr. Williamson publishes "Williamson's Animated Weekly"—two issues a week—devoted to topical subjects. He has six cameramen working for him constantly in the United Kingdom. The American representative of the Williamson Kinetograph Company, Ltd., is the Whyte-Whitman Company, of New York. Mr. Williamson took the train for New York City, Tuesday, August 19.

Geo. L. Cox has been appointed general superintendent of the Advance Motion Picture Company, this city. He left for Cameron Dam, Wis., Tuesday, August 19, to film a three-reel story connected with the famous Dietz controversy, taking a strong company with him from this city for that purpose. During a recent trip East, Mr. Cox made a three-reel feature commercial and industrial picture for a Cleveland firm, at the Pilot Films Corporation's studios in Yonkers, in which he used Mr. Morosini's (the Italian banker's) home, for several of the exteriors, which are unusually beautiful.

WINNIFRED GREENWOOD JOINS AMERICAN.

Winnifred Greenwood, late leading lady of the Selig Stock Company in Chicago, has joined the forces of the American Company in Santa Barbara, Cal., at what is said to be a large salary. Before she came into the moving picture world, she had toured this country a number of seasons at the head of her own companies, playing standard drama, and has had a long experience, as she has been on the stage since she was a child. She takes her work very seriously and is essentially an emotional actress, although she has achieved some good results in comedy lines. What she likes most in this line of work is the creative character, and she has been promised this line of roles in association with the American Company. As a thoughtful, well trained actress, possessing a particularly expressive face, and a person with studious mind, she should make good in her new field of action. She created the role of "Pauline Cushman," "Belle Boyd," of the leading role in "Put to the Test"; of the girl in the beautiful allegory "The Sands of Time," "The Lesson," and many other striking plays in which strong individual characterization was called for.

L. A. WOODWARD LEAVES ENTERPRISE.

After a service of three and one-half years as general manager of the Enterprise Optical Co., Chicago, Mr. L. A. Woodward has terminated his connection with that firm. During his tenure of office he became widely known in the moving picture trade as a man of brains, integrity and pleasing personality. Mr. Woodward's chief talents are along the line of general executive work and enterprising business procedure. Mr. Woodward has such faith in the future of moving pictures that he intends to remain in the game, and to that end he is advertising in this week's issue the fact that he is at liberty and open to offers from firms of the first class who may be in need of the services of a man of his calibre.

The War Correspondents.

A Four Reel Balkan War Story by Itala-Danmark.

THIS production has the distinguishing merit of being a good melodrama in an up-to-the-minute setting. It is thoroughly convincing. No matter if the film may have been made elsewhere than in the theater of war, no one can question the authenticity of the color. It is accurate to the point of being instructive. It tells a graphic story of modern warfare with its high power guns, its submarine mines, aeroplanes, and wireless. The bleak mountain country of the Balkan States, the character of the people and of the Turks are all well presented.

On this background appears the story of two war correspondents, representatives of rival papers. The one, Bretton, is characterized by his high sense of duty; the other, Clark, by his rascality. They appear in the war zone as friends, although Clark has by that time attempted to steal some valuable letters of introduction from his co-worker. The theft finally succeeds when Bretton, through a careless misstep, falls down a steep embankment, spraining his arm and ankle. While he is lying helpless at the foot of the cliff, Clark rifles his knapsack at the top.

Meanwhile Sonia, a Bulgarian peasant girl, has lost her father, who was struck by a stray shell. She hears Bretton's groans of pain and, at the risk of her own life, lowers herself down the cliff to his side, helps him to the top, where, in an admirable scene, he discovers the loss of his papers, and takes him into her home to nurse him.

The War Correspondents/Itala-Danmark Film

Scene from "The War Correspondents" (Itala).

When he recovers and returns to his duties he is arrested as a spy, and Clark having robbed him of his papers he cannot establish his true identity. He escapes, stealing the horse of a sleeping cavalryman, and rides to Sonia's home just in time, with her help, to prevent Clark from scooping him. At the same time Bretton recovers his stolen papers, and with these in his possession is able to compete with Clark on an equal footing.

The contest between the two men, to be the first to send news of the war to their respective papers, now grows very hot and bitter. Sonia has caught the spirit of newsgathering and gives Bretton her help in every way. Clark casts aside all considerations of decency and reserve and stoops to any meanness to beat Bretton in the work. The climax comes when some ships of the Sublime Porte are destroyed and Bretton, injured in the wreck of an aeroplane, must leave the task of reporting the loss of the ships to Sonia. She meets Clark, who tries to stop her as she is hurrying to the telegraph office. She eludes him by jumping on a train running at full speed. He tries to overtake her in an automobile, and failing in this, lays a mine to blow up a bridge over which the train passes. Sonia escapes by leaping from the train, which is destroyed, as Clark planned, but in the meantime Clark has reached the telegraph office ahead of her and has filed his telegrams. It seems then that he has won the day, until Bretton appears at a roadside and, with a blast of dynamite, cuts the telegraph wires.

The race between Sonia and Clark to reach the telegraph office is unusually good. Her daring expedient of boarding a train in motion is a startling piece of business. The destruction of the bridge has a first-rate spectacular quality. A sub-title refers to Bretton's cutting of the telegraph wires when his case seems hopelessly lost, as his "master stroke." Such it is and it has a fine dramatic value. The whole play is effective and will make a good feature.

HECHT BUILDING PICTURE THEATER.

H. K. Hecht, of Passaic, N. J., is building a one-story moving picture theater at 6 Lexington Avenue, Passaic, to cost $17,000. It will have a seating capacity of 700.

"The Ghost of Granleigh"

Romantic Edison Photodrama.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

PARTICULARLY adapted for stories of a fanciful nature are moving pictures, especially when accompanied by scenes picturesque and the marvels of double exposure. The Edison Company has published this romance in beautiful form. Some of their directors have developed wonderfully in the selection of exquisite backgrounds and in dressing the author's creation. "The Ghost of Granleigh" shows an exceptionally high idea of the artistic and a ghostly presentation that has rarely if ever been exceeded in delicacy of portrayal.

Scene from "The Ghost of Granleigh" (Edison).

The Granleigh ghost is a good one, though the substance of his shadowy impersonation had a sad history—he had been one of a large number of irresponsible gentlemen who are so afflicted with sated appetites that they only enjoy nibbling at forbidden fruit. He had joined the ever-increasing clan devoted to consoling neglected wives who have quarreled with their commissary department. He becomes uneasy in his spiritual shape and appears at Granleigh Hall in monkish garb when the moonlight is streaming through a window and the yawning butler is about to put out the lights.

Scene from "The Ghost of Granleigh" (Edison).

The impression is there given that the ghost's presence is felt by the characters, though the apparition is shown to the audience. This vague sensibility of an unseen presence is more poetic and inspiring than if it was shown that the living beings actually saw the haunting specter.

The head of the family at Granleigh, an experimental chemist by the name of Newcomb, is so engrossed in his fascinating work that Amy, his wife, is accorded a very small share of his attention. He is almost constantly engaged in his private laboratory and manifests annoyance when she intrudes on his labors. She is a woman; sentiment is the breath of her life; affection is the food her soul feeds upon; she is starving for it when the tempter appears in the person of Arnold, l'ami de la famille. He is a honey bee, and she is a flower in full bloom. It is when she is beginning to yield to the allurements of Arnold that the disembodied spirit of another just like him steps into the triangle and becomes a dominating reactive force.

The ghost makes his presence felt by Newcomb in his laboratory, but the chemist is so intent upon a hazardous experiment that he shakes off the intruding sensation. The invisible monk is more successful when intervening between Arnold and his victim at a moment when she is faltering. The ghost returns to the chemist and causes him in a moment of sleep to dream of what has already happened at Granleigh, when the specter was a villainous gallant, a tragic story which ruined the lives of loving man and wife and sent the "other man" to a monastery for life-long repentance. The chemist awakes with a shudder, but again yields to the fascination of his work. The monk resorts to extreme measures to save the situation, interfering with the delivery of a letter from the lover, and finally causing an explosion in the laboratory as the wife and her consoler are about to elope.

The wife is recalled by the accident to her husband at the moment she is about to commit an irreparable act of folly, and pity for the injured man on whom she was about to inflict an injury brings about a return of natural love. The ghost leaves satisfied that he has made amends and vanishes forever.

ROBERT A. FISCHER.

Robert A. Fischer is one of the more recent stars enlisted in the Lubin Stock Company. Mr. Fischer has for many years been well known by the patrons of the rural drama, being an excellent prototype of the late James Hearne, for whom for many years he was leading man and understudy. Fischer was born in Louisville, Kentucky, and studied his profession under that master of stage management Barney Macauley, since which he has had an unbroken and prosperous career as a character actor of that popular type, the unctuous countryman. Fischer will find excellent demand for his ability in the Lubin studio and many will look for his jolly face and ample figure upon the animated screen.

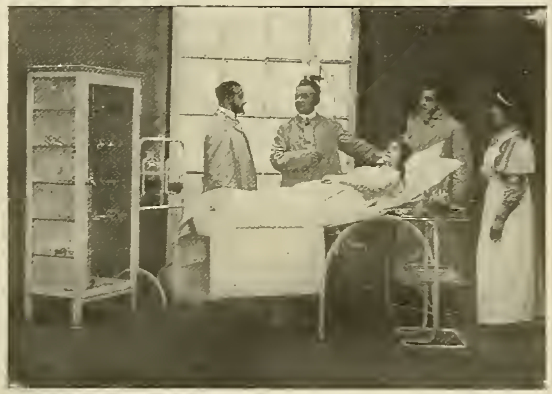
"The Doom of Darkness"

A Powerful Four-Reel Release of The True Feature Co.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS strong photodrama of motif intensely sympathetic and of exquisite photography is one of those screen stories designed to entertain in the very highest sense of the word. The theme is exalted; the characterization is largely that of men who are devoting their lives to splendid work; there are scenes of high educational merit without a touch of the dull and pedantic; it contains nothing to insult decency or intelligence; the whole tale is of the kind one would like to read some afternoon while curled up in a great leather chair of the library. The exteriors are of late autumn; soft greys are in the foreground; the distant hills are in gossamer mist; we are conscious of this refined atmosphere while watching pictures of life as it is lived among those enlightened enough to feel deeply and love nobly. The story is sweet—it has a fragrance of old rose leaves—and it will tightly hold that large number of motion-picture patrons who are undemonstrative because they go often, who are silently tolerant of what is weak and quietly appreciative of productions like this one. It is one of those that remain in the mind after they are seen, that hold the best class of people, that pay the exhibitor's dividends.



Scene from "The Doom of Darkness" (True Feature).

Scene from "The Doom of Darkness" (True Feature)

A distinguished practitioner, a man of lofty character and untiring devotion to his practice finds that he is going blind. He consults a noted oculist and is staggered to learn that he is at a crisis—he will forever lose his sight, live in a world of darkness, unless he at once renounces his professional duties. To a man whose profession is both sweetheart and wife, who has been so long at it as to have no other purpose in living that is immediately discernable, who revolts at the idea of inaction, this decision comes in the nature of a shock. He is, however, a man of wealth and can well afford to rest awhile, so he is on the point of resigning himself to his lot when a telephone message calls him to save the life of a beautiful young girl. Professional instinct, a high sense of duty, love of humanity, all these operate to make him disregard instructions, and he goes incurably blind after performing a successful operation.

The girl is a creature of fine appreciation and keen gratitude. She obtains permission after her recovery to be near the blind practitioner as his solace in affliction. His generous heart revolts at the idea of spoiling her career until her continued devotion in the face of remonstrance leads him to offer his hand in marriage. There is a strong intellectual attraction between them, and the union promises to be one of congenial comrades, when the practitioner's nephew becomes a member of his household. Nature calls to the younger people with such fervor that they yield so far as betraying themselves to each other, but it is in the heart of neither to betray their benefactor, and they agree to part.

The blind man hears keenly and thus discovers the true love existing between those who seem to be destined for each other. He considers their plight to be worse than his own. They are of the future—he is of the past. His sphere of usefulness is closed; he will be helpless to his dying day; it is not fair to rob them of all that would make their lives beautiful; he decides that he is merely an obstacle to the happiness of others instead of a benefactor. He calmly disposes of his property and goes with superb courage to a self-sacrificing end.

Dobbs Will Make Pictures

To Build Studio Near Seattle, Wash—Joseph Conoly to be General Manager and Sales Agent With Offices in New York.

FOR the purpose of taking moving picture films to be placed on the American and European markets, Beverly B. Dobbs, the man who obtained the first moving pictures of wild life in Alaska, "Atop of the World in Motion," which registered a long run at Weber's Theater, New York, last season, has established a studio and laboratory on the shores of Lake Washington, Seattle.

Joseph Conoly

He has obtained the backing of Eastern capital and Joseph Conoly, formerly president of the United States Film Company, will be general manager of the company. The plant will be built by Leo Zoeller, who designed the laboratory used by the Imp and Crystal Moving Picture Companies. With a group of scenario writers, actors, stage managers, and photographic experts already engaged, he expects to have the plant in working order within two months.

"There are moving picture studios on the Pacific coast further south," said Mr. Conoly yesterday at his office in the 45th Street Exchange Building, "but there is no place in the United States that we have been able to find that offers such a variety of scenery as the State of Washington. If one wants to stage a desert scene with burning sands and all that sort of thing, a few hours' ride will land the company in the sage brush. If one wants a snow scene, a few hours' ride into the Cascade Mountains is all that is necessary, and if glacial action is wanted, a short ride will bring the company to the ice masses of Mount Rainer, or in a few days we can land the company in Alaska. If one wants a tropical verdure it can be found on the West coast. The facilities for water scenery are unparalleled anywhere.

"With the improved appliances that will be installed, and for which we have obtained the American rights, the question of the amount of light is not nearly as important a factor in the moving picture business as it was a few years ago. We also have a formula for developing that produces pictures equal to the best manufactured in Europe. We intend to produce educational films and photoplays of the most dramatic nature akin to the stories of Rex Beach and Jack London, and with such a valuable asset as Nature's wonderland for a background, every possibility will be fully realized." The New York offices will be at 145 W. 45th St.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

OPEN LETTER FROM PRESIDENT NEFF.

To Motion Picture Exhibitors.

IT is my duty, I believe, to make a plain statement of facts and, while I reluctantly do so, I want it thoroughly understood that I will not be drawn into any newspaper arguments or personal controversies. My policy in the future will be the same as in the past—to organize the bona fide motion picture exhibitors into a concrete league; to solidify and harmonize all interests pertaining to our business.

At the inception of the league, it was apparent to me that it would require patience, time and money to organize the exhibitors, and after due deliberation, I decided to undertake the gigantic task, fully realizing the obstacles to be overcome. To undertake the organization of several thousand disorganized business men, I appreciated that I would have to sacrifice not only money and time, but several years of my life. I assumed the responsibility, and whether the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America is a success or not, I leave to those who understand what has been accomplished to judge.

At no time since the League was organized has there been placed at my disposal a fund of one dollar to be drawn upon. I have financed and have advanced money to the League from the time of its inception, and have waited until the League could refund the money. I have never had at any time as much as $100 that belonged to the League in my possession. Moneys from all sources are paid to the secretary, which he turns over to the treasurer, after making a record of the amount.

When visiting the various states, the dues of a few states or the money for a charter was paid to me, and this is all of the money that I have ever collected, with the exception of small amounts for traveling expenses, and all the money received for traveling expenses was credited to the league, and the other sent to the secretary. The books of the secretary and treasurer will show every dollar collected and disbursed, and I refer anyone to C. M. Christianson, 703 Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, former secretary, or to Geo. H. Wiley, present secretary, World Theater, Eighth and Highland Avenues, Kansas City, Mo., or J. J. Rieder, treasurer, Jackson, Mich.

The entire amount I have received for salary, office expenses, traveling expenses, incidentals, supplies for the league, etc., from the first day of August, 1912, to the first day of June, 1913, ten months, amounted to $2,794.17. I traveled thousands of miles, kept one stenographer all the time, and part of the time two, paid printers' bills for the making of the charter, and a number of other bills, and the total amount for salary and all of these expenses amounts to $2,794.17.

The books of the league are open to any member to verify every statement made. There is not now and never was a dollar placed in any bank or fund by the league that I might draw upon for the running expenses of the league, and I never received a dollar from the league except by check which had to be authorized by the secretary and indorsed by the treasurer.

At the New York convention, an auditing committee was appointed, and on Friday morning, July 11, they asked for more time, and Mr. Wiley, chairman of the committee, announced to the convention that the books were open to anyone's investigation who might wish to look them over. The convention voted on Wednesday, July 9, to nominate officers on Thursday afternoon, and make it a special order of business to elect officers Friday morning, July 11th. As the election of officers had been made a special business for Friday morning, I ruled the first thing in order after the calling of the roll (as it was almost eleven o'clock before the roll was complete) that the convention would proceed to elect officers.

A New York delegate appealed from the decision of the chair. A vote was taken and the chair was sustained. When the State of Texas was reached, it was apparent to everybody that I would be elected by at least two to one, and it was well known that every State from Texas on was solid for me.

I positively did not attend a caucus, did not ask a delegate to support me, and while I knew all that was transpiring, and was familiar with the things that were said on the trains, in the lobbies and other places, I tried in every way to avoid strife, and to maintain harmony and peace. When the convention was opened and I asked a delegate from Chicago to please be seated so the roll could be called; he refused to take his seat, and the sergeant-at-arms was called upon to seat him. Several delegates were forced to leave for home before a vote was taken for the election of officers.

In conclusion, I desire to say to the motion picture exhibitors throughout the country that I am working night and day to bring about a condition beneficial to every exhibitor, and to establish our line of business on a firm, substantial basis, whereby each and every exhibitor, large and small, may receive a square deal, and that we may eliminate the possibility of unjust discrimination that has existed heretofore; and to this end I am and will continue to fight until justice and commercial freedom are established, and every motion picture exhibitor enjoys his inherent right of freedom. A. NEFF.

President of Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

WATCH FOR WISCONSIN CONVENTION.

Wisconsin exhibitors are requested by President Neff to watch for announcement of a special State convention to be held in their State. The time and place will be given in an early issue of this publication; most probably in the next number.

CALL FOR ILLINOIS CONVENTION.

A special State convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Illinois has been called by National President M. A. Neff, to take place in Peoria, Ill., on Tuesday and Wednesday, September 16 and 17. Special Organizer Clem Kerr will be in the State several days prior to the convention. A new set of State officers will be elected.

CALL FOR INDIANA CONVENTION.

A special convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Indiana has been called by National President M. A. Neff, to take place in Muncie, on Thursday and Friday, September 25 and 26. Special Organizer Clem Kerr will be in the State several days prior to the convention. A new set of officers will be elected.

FIRST FLORIDA CONVENTION.

The first convention of the Florida State Branch No. 33 of the M. P. E. L. of A. will be held at Tampa, from Monday, August 31 to September 3.

The Majestic Theater, owned by President Griffith, of the Florida State Branch No. 33, has been loaned by him for headquarters for the convention. Quite a program has been arranged and a large attendance is expected. Although the Florida State Branch No. 33 is still in its infancy, it is making rapid strides towards becoming one of the strongest branches in the South. An attractive program has been arranged and all attending exhibitors will be looked after by a competent entertainment committee.

For further information apply to E. O. Griffith, Majestic Theater, Tampa, Fla., or A. H. La Belle, Kinodrome Theater, Tampa, Fla.

MAINE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE PROGRESSING.

Mr. Moxley Blumenberg, President of the Maine State Branch, M. P. E. L. of A., No. 29, reports that the organization is doing well, and that the list of members is increasing, somewhat slowly, but steadily. The next formal meeting is called for Bangor, Me., to be held just after Labor Day. A letter has been sent out to each member, of which there are about 30, urging them to be sure to bring non-members with them to the Bangor meeting. All non-members have been notified of the importance of quickly joining the organization, and requested to come to Bangor without fail. Considerable interest is manifested by Maine exhibitors in the branch, and a very well attended meeting is sure to be held at Bangor. HENRY.

OPERATORS' LICENSE LAW KNOCKED OUT.

Cincinnati Judge Holds Ordinance Unconstitutional.

Holding that the ordinance providing for the licensing of moving picture operators is unconstitutional, Common Pleas Judge Gorman, of Cincinnati, Ohio, handed down a decision August 7, discharging Samuel Lewis, who conducts the Empire Theater, 3831 Spring Grove Avenue, that city, from the custody of the police. Lewis was arrested July 2, charged with operating a moving picture machine without having a licensed operator in charge. Attorney Amos P. Foster immediately secured a writ of habeas corpus, which was heard by Judge Gorman.

The ordinance provides for a license fee of $1 being paid by the operator, "after which he shall be examined and show to the satisfaction of said board that he is fully qualified and competent to operate such machine." Upon this the court says in part:

> It will be noticed that under this ordinance providing for a Board of Examiners of four that these examiners are made the absolute autocrats, with unlimited discretion as to whom they shall issue a certificate, and who they shall say is competent. True, the ordinance provides that the applicant shall be examined and show to the satisfaction of said board that he is fully qualified and competent to operate a moving picture machine; but there is no standard of qualification fixed; there is no provision for an examination upon any subject or subject matter. Under this ordinance the examination might extend only to the color of the applicant's hair, the appearance of his eyes, or any other physical qualities which he might possess.

The decision was the result of a test case instituted by the Exhibitors' League of Cincinnati, and the members thereof are jubilant over the outcome. They say in a typewritten statement, in part:

"This decision means that any one can operate a motion picture machine in the city of Cincinnati that can secure a position. However, the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, in Cincinnati, will employ only skilled, competent operators. Cincinnati has the largest and most perfectly equipped operating school in the world and only such operators as can show a diploma from the Cincinnati Operators' School, or a recommendation from a member of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League as to his efficiency, integrity and sobriety will be given consideration. Judge Gorman's decision makes it possible for students and highly educated, sober, industrious young men to qualify themselves for the position of motion picture machine operators, and by his decision a higher standing and more thoroughly projected picture will soon be noticeable upon the screens of the Cincinnati moving picture theaters. A few more decisions rendered fearlessly by honest, intelligent judges, like Judge Gorman of Cincinnati, will release the commercial shackles from the motion picture exhibitor that he has so long endured. Cleveland boasts of 130 picture shows, Cincinnati second with 93. The last membership certificate issued by the State of Ohio was No. 622. This shows the activity of the organization."

"DANIEL."

"Daniel in the Lion's Den" and "The Children of Israel," in the fiery furnace, were never put to a severer test than the Vitagraph players who took part in "The Life of Daniel," under the direction of Director Fred Thomson. The making of this picture is not only an extraordinary undertaking, but an exceedingly expensive one. Specially designed for it was the fiery furnace, built from historic data, after careful research. It is represented in the form of a gigantic bull's head, the interior of which contains the blazing fiery furnace in which Shadrack, Meshac and Abednego proved their unflinching trust in the God of their Fathers. Much ingenuity was exercised in showing this feature of the picture. We can really see the Children of Israel in the midst of the great flames which shoot out from the head of the beast, which the Assyrians held as sacred among their many false gods.

"Daniel in the Lion's Den" is even more thrilling. Charles Kent, of the Vitagraph players, who takes the part of "Daniel" in this scene, enters the den of ferocious lions, who at first greet him with snarls and gnashing of teeth; but in accordance with the biblical records of the story, they become harmless as he prayerfully stands among them.

The producing of these two scenes involved a large expenditure of money in the building, the securing of the animals and the time involved. These two scenes cost the Vitagraph Company not less than $10,000. More than 500 extra persons besides the Vitagraph players were employed in them.

Another scene of great dramatic power is "The Dream of Nebuchadnezzar," when he sees the enormous statue of gold and silver and watches it break in thousands of pieces at the climax of his vision. The construction of this statue cost over $800.

JOE BRANDT GOES TO LONDON.

Universal's Publicity Man to Open Up Campaign on the Other Side—John Tippett Foreign Sales Manager

Joe Brandt, the well-known publicity man of the Universal Film Company, sails on Tuesday, August 26, for London. Mr. Brandt plans to open up a campaign in London and Berlin for his company that will set before the film men of the other side the merits of the Universal product in a manner perhaps new to them and certainly vigorous in style. Surely Mr. Brandt has had the training and he has the native ability to do just this sort of thing Mr. Brandt intends to remain abroad until such time as he has placed the advertising of Universal films on a firm footing and to the satisfaction of the officers of his company, when he will return to the home office and his duties in London will be taken up by another.

Joe Brandt is one of the best known film men in this country. There have been few, if any, conventions of exhibitors in the United States, whether in Massachusetts or California, that he has missed attending. He has a way with him—and it is always with him. He makes friends—and he keeps them. Every one of them will wish him success in his new undertaking—and no one of them will have any doubt of his complete success. He is a man who brings to his work an enthusiasm that carries conviction with it.

John Tippett, who formerly was the general manager of Union Features, and a man well known to the trade, is now in London. He will be the general sales manager of Universal films. Mr. Tippett thoroughly understands the film business. He is aggressive, forceful and active. He has traveled all over the United States, and the knowledge he has acquired here will redound to the benefit of his company in his dealings abroad. Between Mr. Tippett and Mr. Brandt the British film men will have set for them a pace that undoubtedly will cause them to sit up and take notice.

NEW EXCHANGE FOR INDIANAPOLIS.

Articles of incorporation were filed during the past week by the Peerless Film and Supply Company, of Indianapolis, Ind., capitalized at $10,000. A handsome suite of offices and sales rooms has been opened in the Willoughby Building, 224 N. Meridian Street. Leon J. Bamberger, formerly of Kinemacolor and the Mutual Film Exchange, of Indianapolis, will be the general manager. This exchange will not be affiliated with any group of manufacturers, but will buy in the open market on a basis of merit. Besides films, a line of supplies will be handled. It is said that several influential Indianapolis business men are behind the project. Mr. Bamberger has returned from a trip to the Eastern film centers, where he has arranged for the brands of film he will handle.

REPORT OF INDEPENDENT NEW YORK STATE MEETING.

A meeting of motion picture exhibitors engaged in business in New York State, but not affiliated with the M. P. E. L. of A., was held at the Yates Hotel, August 11, on the same day with that of the New York branch of the M. P. E. L. of A., but in another part of the hotel. Samuel H. Trigger, of New York City, presided over the meeting. A resolution was adopted to the effect that the organization be known as the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of New York State.

The following State officers were elected: President, Samuel H. Trigger, New York; first vice-president, B. E. Cornell, Syracuse; second vice-president, H. L. Fox, Binghamton, N. Y.; secretary, William O. Douque, Utica; treasurer, John G. Davis, Saugerties; chairman executive committee, J. B. Freeman, Buffalo.

There was an attendance of twenty-nine present, composing the officers of various locals consisting of Albany, Schenectady, Utica, Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, Oswego, Binghamton and New York City.

After pleading fidelity to Mr. Trigger and the new International Motion Picture Association and making plans for organizing new locals throughout the State, the delegates went to the city hall, where a local cameraman took motion pictures of the group descending the steps of the building.

E. O. BROOKS LEAVES GAUMONT COMPANY.

Mr. E. O. Brooks will terminate his engagement as publicity expert of the Gaumont Company, Flushing, L. I., on August 23. He goes to Montreal to take up his labors where he left off three months ago; prior to joining Gaumont, as head of the E. Oswald Brooks Booking Company, which has been conducted by his partners during his absence.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

ONE of the notable signs of the gradual fading away of the summer season is the return of photoplayers to their respective studios. Although the faces of the favorites have continued appearing upon the screen during the season, giving the impression to the outside world that "the poor things have to work all the time—summer and winter," many of them have managed to escape from the studios to enjoy a stay at the seashore, in the mountains, or with "the old folks at home." To acquire this opportunity, of course, they were obliged to put in some very steady and hard work, so that the studios could "stock up" pictures to which these players were assigned, and no doubt some of them are doing the same thing to make up for lost time, but of this most of them think little. A few days of relaxation offset the extra labor, most of them say.

A lady who is one of the most prominent players in one of the leading photoplay producing companies was met at one of the railway stations recently, just before her departure for a vacation. "Am I going away from here? Well, you can wager all you have on it—just as quick as the dear old train can carry me. Where am I going? I really cannot say. When I learned a vacation had been granted me my first thought was to get away—rush away to some secluded spot on the earth where I might rest. I picked up a newspaper and selected from the summer resort advertisements a country place up the State. I understand the place at which I am to stop is ten miles from the railway station. Fresh eggs, fresh butter—everything fresh but the boarders. I understand that will not be tolerated. Yes, I am going away—going where I can be alone and have nobody to speak to me except the waitress; where the awful voice of the director will not be heard and I will not be aroused in the morning by the telephone and have my nerves shattered by some dreadful voice telling me that I have held a scene for forty minutes. How pleasant it will be to dress in the morning, leisurely walk to the dining room and listen to the sweet-voiced waitress ask 'Will you have aigs or se-reals?' instead of having that awful director shout, 'Now put on a face and cough your worst.' Yes, indeed, I am going away."

To the uninitiated—to those who imagine that photoplayers do not work, the enthusiasm displayed by the departing actress may seem exaggerated. Visitors to studios see the players lounging about, some reading, some thinking, others conversing. "What an easy life!" many are heard remarking. But few realize how irksome these "waits" are and how much they contribute to the weariness of the players when work for the day is done. A player stated that, although he put less time in actual work in pictures, he suffered more from the effects of what he did than when he was in stock theaters. Photoplayers, he said, need vacations as much as other players, and he was pleased to see that most of the producing concerns were beginning to show they realized it. Stock theater people are under a great strain in being obliged to commit lines for the succeeding week while carrying along those of the current production, but they have a chance for relief. He was playing leads, he said, with a prominent stock company and went through it for thirty weeks with far less fatigue than he felt at the expiration of a less period with a photoplay company. This he accounted for by saying that in the stock theater there was another member of the company who was more suitable for some parts than he was and by reason of this they could change off, alternating with heavy or long parts. "That's a good idea if you could get the manager to sanction it," remarked a listener. "It was carried out in our company to the entire satisfaction of everybody concerned," was the reply, "and with far better results than we could have attained if the other fellow or myself had been worked to death. But that cannot be done in the photoplay game. Somehow we get a 'run' and to make good and keep from getting stale with the public we must be Johnny on the spot all the time. The public is awfully unsympathetic. They get accustomed to seeing certain players and are prompt in expressing disappointment almost to the verge of dissatisfaction when their favorites do not appear upon the screen. Alteration, or substitution, will not go in the photoplay. The patrons will not stand for it."

"And yet," continued the actor, "how easily are favorites forgotten! That is one great distinguishing feature in the temperament of the amusement public. For years after some stage favorite has departed you will read and hear people speak of his triumphs. Not so with the photoplay favorite. In almost every instance where a favorite has changed from one company to another his or her popularity has dropped, for a time at least. Why, one of the greatest favorites in the history of motion pictures is almost forgotten, although the player has been off the screen but a few months. The knowledge of this may be why some players do not make strenuous applications for vacations. They fear that lukewarm spirit on the part of the public and the possibility of some unknown quantity budding."

* * *

The whimsical nature of the theater-going public as touched upon by the photoplayer led to a discussion of the effect produced by the retiring of favorites. It was finally agreed that, after all, the diamond of the photoplay does not contain that intrinsic value that it has been supposed to embody. A change of base almost invariably impairs the lustre to some extent. There have been few exceptions in photoplay life. There was a time when the burning question was "If so-and-so leaves the ——— company the popularity of the films will die out." Results have not sustained the predictions. While certain players have aided to a great extent in attracting attention to and building up the popularity of certain makes of film, the fact remains that at the test they have been secondary in the minds of the public. This is not very encouraging to the hard working, conscientious photoplayer, but it is nevertheless the plain, unvarnished truth. So long as the maker of films maintains the desired standard he holds the people, regardless of the change of cast. Unfortunately for him, the photoplayer has not been able to share the good fortune of his stage brother in securing a deep-rooted popularity that will cling to him regardless of his base of operations. It may come later on, but it is doubtful, and a conservative view for the photoplayer who "has them going" is to stick to it. The exceptions have been few and the outlook does not bring to view a material increase of them.

These are but the reflections of sentiments of some players who have been giving the matter considerable thought. They have a vital bearing upon the question as to the extent to which the personal popularity of a photoplayer can be measured as his stock in trade, and to what extent it may be relied upon to aid him in the attainment of his ambitions. The subject is an interesting one, particularly in view of the approaching advent of new blood into the motion picture field. The big productions that are coming will tell the tale—the play or the player! The hope of the photoplayer appears to lie in the perfection of talking pictures—when the player will be able to combine voice and action satisfactorily, and that appears too remote at present. But here's luck to all the photoplayers, and let those who have been "going" keep agoing.

Here is the wail of a studio manager: "I don't want a vacation. All I want is to be relieved of having parents running here and looking for girls and boys. When the summer is over and the schools reopen I hope there will be a big change. A woman rushed in here the other day and shouted, 'I vant my Lena. Yes she is vorking here. She told me so. I don't vant her to be a bicjure actor. I got a job for her in der resdraunt.' I had a task convincing the woman her daughter was not here. It was the old story of shouldering the pictures with the responsibility for the girl's absence from home. We have on hand at all times more help than we want; help that need the money and can do the work."

A NEW PRODUCER IN CHICAGO.

Willard Newell, of the famous Newell Bros., long associated with various forms of theatrical productions, has taken a position as a producer at the Selig Polyscope Plant. Mr. Newell's intimate acquaintance with standard drama and the lighter forms of comedy should qualify him well for work in the new direction. The peculiar gift for putting comedy over through the medium of motography appears to be rather difficult when it follows the strictly legitimate line, and Mr. Newell's success in this specialty argues well for his stewardship in picture-play making.

Music for the Picture

Piano Versus Orchestra.

"EDITOR Music for the Picture Department: In a recent issue I read with much interest the article by 'A correspondent who does not wish his name given.' Evidently this correspondent has had considerable experience with the general class of theatre managers; but when he says, 'just a word for those who think an orchestra violinist or drummer an improvement' I think I can safely say I am one of hundreds of a different opinion. If the leader of an orchestra can choose suitable music and interpret it (you hit the nail on the head when you said 'interpret it.'—Ed.) according to the action of the picture, what more can a pianist alone do? He can improvise—fake in—but is the quality there? An orchestra leader who has a large repertoire of music and is thoroughly familiar with it can find music with different tempi and rythm to suit any action in the picture, accenting for climaxes with more effective results than the piano alone. There are scenes in pictures that no music will exactly describe. Then why not music suited as a whole, with a combination of instruments pleasing to the general patronage of the picture theaters? The piano alone has had its day; the slam-bang drummer is fading into oblivion and is being supplanted by the 'musician drummer' with bells, chimes, tympani, etc. The piano-drum combination which I think the correspondent refers to has long been replaced in the theaters here by five, six and seven-piece orchestras. It is a fact that some first-class theaters are paying more for music than for picture service. Why? They realize that to-day about twenty-five per cent. of the pictures are of a high-class quality. Surely if an audience sits through four reels of pictures of which on an average about one in four is good, and the orchestra is capable of playing a pleasing program suitable to the pictures as a whole, isn't that a redeeming feature? I hear occasionally from patrons, 'I didn't think so much of the pictures to-night, but the music was splendid.' When the manufacturers realize the importance of music for the picture and have such music arranged and timed for the different scenes, action, etc., employing someone who is capable of selecting music of quality from the unlimited supply on the market, then we will have music exactly characteristic of the picture. But when will that day come? So in the meantime why not music as a whole by a combination of instruments, which is more pleasing and effective to the majority? The piano alone can never stop the scraping feet and wagging tongues in a picture theater, as that instrument is too montonous and common to command such attention no matter how expert the performer. Granting the correspondent's idea is a practical one, where shall we find a sufficient number of Paderewski's and Chopin's to supply the demand? Imagine a piano alone playing for the Edison's three-reel 'Mary Stuart,' compared with a five- or six-piece orchestra. He may play appropriate enough music to all the scenes, but there is not enough body to the instrument to uphold the big scenes. I sincerely hope to have the pleasure of hearing from other contributors to this department in reference to the piano alone versus the orchestra. H. R. Seeman, Musical Director, Lafayette Theater, New Orleans, La."

By "music as a whole" Mr. Seeman undoubtedly means music which applies to the general theme of the picture rather than playing to the scenes in detail. It is a very difficult matter to change the music for the varying scenes with an orchestra in all pictures, though it can be done very effectively in some—notably war pictures, Indian pictures and others of strongly contrasted scenes. In rapidly alternating scenes (cut-backs) it is, of course, preferable for the orchestra to play to the dominating theme of the subject rather than skip around as the scenes change, thus avoiding that "patch-work" effect.

As to the attitude of the manufacturers regarding special music for their releases, there is something to be said on both sides of the question. A number of the producers have at various times issued music for some of their pictures—sometimes for orchestra, sometimes piano alone—but their efforts have not met with the encouragement from musicians which they deserved. Judging from letters I have received (a few of which I have published) musicians are ready with blame, but chary with praise. It costs money to get out special music with a picture, and when a manufacturer is enterprising enough to do this we should meet him half way, buy the music, play it and not hastily condemn it in case it should not happen to fit exactly the system we are accustomed to employ in laying out a program. (This is not meant for you, Brother Seeman, but for the clientele in general.)

The many opinions expressed by the many contributors to this page show how widely people may differ in their ideas as to proper music for pictures and the correct manner of applying it. For this reason alone should a manufacturer issue music for one of his pictures; let us be fair and meet him half way. If we like it, say so; if not, say why. If we like some parts and not others, give the reason for our preference and dislike. The manufacturer is working in the dark when he has music adapted to his picture; he is "feeling us out," and if we do not respond intelligently he finds little encouragement to experiment further. Let us buy it and try it—criticize it if we will, praise where we can, but cut out the "roasts." They cannot suit every individual whim, but they would like to please musicians in general if they can find out what we want.

Mr. Seeman encloses an excellent program for the Vitagraph special, "THE SNARE OF FATE." (Written by Miss Eliza G. Harrel, of New Orleans.)

PART ONE.

1. Valse—Chopin Op. 64 No. 2. Until title: "Ralph Is Announced," then:
2. "I'm Falling in Love with Someone," (from Naughty Marietta), (once through). Back to Chopin valse again until title: "Affair of the Season"; then:
3. Count of Luxembourg Waltzes until title: "Young, Pretty, Popular, etc."
4. "Love Me, Let the World Go By," (Rossiter). Twice through, then:
5. "Heart of My Heart," (Von Tilzer), until end of reel.

PART TWO.

6. "Bees." Novelette, (Remick), until title: "Bon Voyage."
7. Chorus of "Good-bye, Sweetheart, Good-bye," until title: "Ralph's Genius Has, etc."
8. "In the Soudan." (Oriental, published by Fischer), until Ralph is brought in office.
9. Sphinx Waltzes until title: "A Joyless Honeymoon"; then:
10. "Heart to Heart" (Witmark), until end of reel.

PART THREE.

11. Valse Brillante from "The Siren," until title: "Her First Reception."
12. "Heart to Heart," again until title: "Elated with His Success, etc."
13. "Good-bye, Old Pal" (Rossiter), two choruses, then:
14. "Simple Aveu," until husband is notified of death, then:
15. "Asa's Death" (Peer Gynt Suite—Greig), until end of reel.

A letter signed C. A. W. contains this: "Our manager is talking of getting the Hiawatha picture. What shall I get to play for it? Can you tell me of some good Indian music?"

Special music has been written for the "Hiawatha" feature by Mr. Brahm. Get this by all means. It is practical for piano (or organ) alone, but is arranged for orchestra—ten parts, I believe. As to Indian music (or what passes for such) to be used with other pictures, there are the old stand-by's—"Indian War Dance" (published by J. Church & Co.), "Sun Dance" (Witmark), "Oska-loo-sa-loo," and some of the popular order—Harry Von Tilzer's "Kick-a-poo," for example. The "Wa-Wan Press," of Newton Centre, Mass., publishes a few songs—"Zunian Lullaby," "Lone Prairie" and "The Sunrise Call." Also an instrumental number (piano) called "The Domain of Huraken." The latter is quite long, rather difficult and tempestuous. Another song by Lorena Beresford, on the sentimental order is called "Indian Serenade" (published by G. Schirmer).

Moving Picture Educator

"A PIECE OF STEAK" BY JACK LONDON.

Reviewed by the Rev. W. H. Jackson.

This is a two reel subject a little out of the usual run of moral subjects in that the strength of the lesson is the outcome of the evils of boxing. The first reel is given entirely over to the success of a young boxer who rises to fame through first defeating a bully. There are several professional boxing matches shown, though fortunately not prolonged, only sufficient being given for the purpose of depicting the several "knockouts." Flushed with his successes the young boxer, of course, marries the young woman who is the first cause of contention.

A life of luxury is now the rule; an elaborate bungalow, a magnificent automobile, and the usual life lived by such who fancy the flush of first successes as everlasting. A new fight is forthcoming, the boxer seems to be giving a beefsteak dinner judging by the quantity he buys, taking care to give a splendid sirloin cut to a bulldog which is the ungainly pet of the house. Of course, he wins the fight and the first reel ends with every one wondering what the title of the piece has to do with it; at present nothing has occurred to connect it with the subject in the mind of the observer.

In the second reel the successful young boxer is shown living the usual fast life; drink, cards, and, of course, gambling are the main attractions. At home he receives notice of the foreclosure of his mortgage, and from this time the downward grade begins. After five years he is found living in poverty; his beautiful wife and child are the victims of distress and hunger, while he appears as a typical loafer. Just at this time a call comes from the old life; can he take his place in a fight? The money would be a great deliverer; he is, however, too weak to hold his own. Having nothing but bread to eat he longs for a "piece of steak." His wife bravely goes out to buy one, but having no money, credit is refused; at home he waits dreamily; in fancy he sees himself in his better days giving the steak to the dog and the contrast overwhelms him.

He goes into his last fight; in his weakened condition he is counted out for the first time; the victor is acclaimed while he is shunned and left alone. Sadly he drags himself home; his wife is waiting the result with more than the common interest of the old days; looking through the window he sees the picture of poverty, distress and despair within and collapses on the window sill.

The lesson of the moral value of a "piece of steak" is now seen; one who ruthlessly and with moral abandon throws steak to the dog, may live to see the time when he may need it himself. In such precarious walks of life as those in which prize-fighters move, the hero of today may be the scorned of tomorrow. The sudden acquisition of wealth to an unbalanced character may be the means of more ultimate distress than the steady round of an even life can possibly meet. If these are some of the lessons Jack London has in view in filming this subject, no doubt the moral effect will be beneficial and the picture will find its place among those listed for good and educational benefits. The picture is another instance where the ambiguity of the title serves the good purpose of hiding the valuable lesson under an alluring theme which holds the attention while a right subtle teaching is being inculcated in every mind.

MAGNETS.

An interesting and complete lesson is taught by this Gaumont film giving the fundamental principles of the magnet. By a series of very clear pictures the details of the making of a magnet are shown. The primitive metallic substance, iron-oxide, is seen to have the powers of magnetic attraction. The qualities of iron and steel as magnetic agents are demonstrated; iron by magnetization becomes a magnet, while steel naturally lends itself to magnetic powers. The way in which iron loses and steel retains these strange powers is fully illustrated. The magnetic increase in steel that has been tempered is proved, as also that nickel is, after iron, easily subjected to magnetic influence. The powers of attraction and repulsion are exhibited, explaining that bodies of dissimilar or opposite tendencies are required for attraction; while those of like or similar tendencies repel each other. The fact that magnetized bodies lose their powers when heated are also shown. In fitting conclusion the magnetic needle is now shown and explained; its uses on land, sea, and more recently in the air by aviators, are fully illustrated, as are also its fidelity to the north pole. The detail pictures are wonderfully clear making the teaching of this valuable lesson exceedingly simple and easy; the film is an addition to the already strong list of educational films.

"TINY TIM AND THE ELEPHANT."

It is not often that a humorous picture is noticed on this page, but, if the training of a young elephant to become as docile and domesticated as the house cat is an educational triumph, it certainly ought to have some notice. Moreover, Tiny Tim, the seven year old prodigy of the Gaumont Paris studios, ought to have some recognition of his valuable services in that kind of moving picture, which is going to interest millions of children like himself. The relationship which exists between Tim and the elephant is nothing short of marvellous and must be seen to be both believed and appreciated. To bring the elephant in the house and have him sit at the family table and behave properly is no small matter; it is, however, but an incident out of many in this extraordinary little play. It is a picture that will interest adults and enrapture children.

Scene from "Tiny Tim and The Elephant" (Gaumont).

THE LAKE OF SALZBURG.

For scenic beauty as well as the knowledge of these places this film fills its appointed purpose. Traveling through Zmunden, Hallstedt, and by the Chateau of Ort the traveller has a glimpse of a region of combined natural and cultivated beauty; a journey on the lakes amply repays any distance traveled to enjoy the surroundings; thanks to the Kinematograph, while sitting at home all may now see these scenes and enjoy the rare privileges hitherto denied the greater number of people.

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

From our own Correspondent.

THE Middlesex County Council, which controls the licensing of a considerable number of the moving picture theaters in greater London, are again discussing the vexatious question of Sunday opening. To define their attitude as puritanical, would, in view of recent events, be but a mild denomination, and as other licensing authorities in this country are often in the habit of following the larger bodies concerning matters of local legislature, a letter from the Police Commissioner to the Middlesex Council should effectively dispose, once and for all, of the moss-grown notion that Sunday shows are incentives to the "devil to find work for idle hands." The letter said, amongst other things, that "from a police point of view it has not been found to be open to any objection."

The latest American picture playing personality to visit Europe is Miss Pearl White, who recently landed from the Olympic. Miss White, it is stated, is to visit the principal studios in England, France and Italy for the purpose of making comparative studies of photography acting in these countries with that in America. She returns to New York to resume work with the Crystal Film Co. in about two months.

A truly remarkable and praiseworthy achievement has been completed by Fred Burlingham, a cameraman of the British and Colonial Co., who has successfully filmed an ascent of the world famous peak, the Matterhorn. Apart from the fact that he took pictures all the way, the Matterhorn has not been negotiated so early in the season before, and on two occasions the party was caught in a blizzard. Mr. Burlingham's only food on the two days' task was a ham sandwich and a few dried prunes.

At the Kinematograph conference held in London at Easter, a number of prominent educationalists, including the headmasters of Eton, Rugby, and Winchester, were delegated to report upon the educational uses and abuses of the Kinematograph. The opening statement says that the Kinematograph, as a means of entertainment and instruction, is now so firmly established that it would be quite out of the question to attempt to suppress it. Dr. G. E. W. Wallin, of Cleveland, Ohio, gave special evidence under the section dealing with abuses and he quoted the action of the Cleveland Humane Society in condemning forty per cent. of 290 films submitted to them. Similar evidence was forthcoming from influential and well informed people in other countries, and even in the case of the United States the report (evidently constructed from the depositions of Dr. Wallin) says that in spite of the various American censorships the report of the Cleveland Humane Society proves that, as far as children are concerned, much remains to be done in regulating the use of the Kinematograph in the United States.

Capt. Murray has introduced a bill into Parliament for the suppression of certain kinds of advertisements, electric signs, and objectionable posters. It is said that the moving picture theater is a persistent offender in the display of the latter, but, as the bill appears to have little likelihood of passing, I don't think showmen are worrying in the least. Speaking of electric signs reminds me of a novel device adopted by a London theater. In front of the pay box is an ordinary door mat which when stood upon establishes an electrical connection which rings a bell in the pay box (in this case it was a large one with five windows), and illuminates an electric sign above the girdle worded "How many, please?"

Edison's British manager, Mr. H. R. Smith, took the New Gallery, the principal show in London, for his trade matinee of "What Happened to Mary," last week.

Mr. Cyril Maude, the eminent actor, is expected in New York any moment. Immediately before embarking on this side he played the part of Capt. Barley in "Beauty and the Barge," for the London Film Co.

Moving picture theaters have been erected in various places in this country since the first institution of the silent stage. Barns, saloons, churches, and schools have in their turn bowed to the "movies," but the crowning glory seems to be the conversion of the top of a railway station, at Bow, into a picture theater. The Woolwich Borough Council have also started to convert one of their swimming baths into a picture show for the winter.

Mr. F. Von Madeler, an inventor, has invented a new process of direct color photography and has applied, with success I am told, his discovery to moving picture films. He claims, however, a still greater advantage by the adoption of a sound synchronizer along the edge of the film, the object of which is to accompany the pictures by words and music. At present all sound and picture synchronizers consist of ordinary films and ordinary gramaphones worked simultaneously with an electric synchronizer in the operating box. This invention disposes of the gramaphone and its records of limited duration so that one obtains a continuous verbal accompaniment to the film throughout its entire length. Further details are not to hand, but the rapidity of forming a company for the working of the invention would suggest that great possibilities are in store for the idea.

The Kinemacolor Co. is about to release a film of Anita H. Mill's famous morality play "Everyman."

Many film renters in London continue to voice their mystification at the practice of American manufacturers to develop films intended for the European market in Paris. Many of the larger companies have now their own plants in the latter city. As will be known, it is the general custom of American producers to make two or three negatives of each subject. One of these is retained and the other sent to Paris, where prints are turned out for London, Berlin, Rome, Madrid, and other capitals. Now the argument of the Londoner is that films for the European market should be produced as far as possible in London, not only because of the lower tariff duties on imports, but because this country is the largest user of American films.

George Eastman, the Kodak king, is at present staying in London for a few days. His headquarters are, of course, the Kodak shops that besprinkle the city, yet he has managed to find time to visit the offices and showrooms of one or two of the leading American houses.

Ramo Films, Ltd., the new American producing firm, has appointed the General Film Agency, of London, its agents on this side.

"The Last Days of Pompeii," taken by the Photo Drama Co. of Chicago, has been sold as an exclusive to Messrs. Jury's, the London renters.

The American Co., I am told, to insure good swordsmanship in some new duel films about to be rehearsed, has engaged a fencing expert from the School of Military Fencing, Brussels. He is to leave for America almost immediately.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Not Wholly Funny.

LAUGHS that are more or less dependent on profanity are not to be commended, not even when there is no actual use of a profane expression. One card before us starts out "Go to H" in thirty point bold face and "Hear the crowds laugh and applaud" in a twelve point light face.

That would do very well for a barroom advertisement, but the appeal of the photoplay theater is made to women and children as well as men and the awkward phrasing of the greeting line clearly shows the intent. It does no good to the house nor to the pictures in general, and instead of being effective the advertisement suggests that the airdome it advertises is run by a person utterly unfit to be in charge of a place of amusement. This very probably is not the case, but the outsider may judge only by the evidence at hand, and this card hurts instead of helps. It is possible to be funny without being coarse or profane; indeed profanity and coarseness are not clever, and the influence of this card is damaging and hurtful.

On the Other Hand.

In glaring contrast is a folder sent by Thomas Furniss, who is National Vice-President for Minnesota in the Exhibitors' League as well as president of the Brunswick Amusement Company, of Duluth. The folder is on brown paper with black ink and advertises the opening of the Rex Theater, in that town. It is printed on a sheet 10 by 13 folded without trimming, the cover containing simply the name and the date, the latter fully spelled out. On one of the middle pages the opening is announced in a few polite and modest phrases. The entire folder has an air of quiet elegance that will appeal to the better class of theater goers. We do not think that they will have to resort to profanity to attract attention.

When you put out a piece of paper, do not consider how it sounds to you. Regard its probable effect on your prospective patrons. If you are catering to women and children who use the language of truck drivers in a traffic jam, then "speak their speech" and use profanity, too, but if you want to cater to a good patronage use their mode of speech.

We think it just a bit significant that one of the underlines on the post card announces that there are always eight or more reels shown.

Thinking It Over.

A. B. Spooner, Jr., of the Parrsboro Opera House, named after that Nova Scotia town, writes:

> Some time ago I sent you a bunch of dodgers which you criticised freely and honestly; you showed me faults that were very apparent when once pointed out. One remark you made has caused me a great deal of thought. You said, in regard to my assertions that certain pictures were good, that it may all be so, "but why." I have often thought of that in writing my bills and trying to get out of my rut and when I tried to put something into it to make the public want to see the show I have tried to inject a reason why.
> I am sending you some more dodgers for criticism and you will notice a slight change in the style, if not an improvement.

Telling Them Why.

Mr. Spooner sends some dodgers that show improvement. He does not say that a story is a big feature or that it is a sensational and thrilling drama, or the most laughable comedy ever produced. He runs a few lines to give a hint of the quality and leaves the rest to pique the curiosity of the audience. He gets them started and gives them enough to get started with, then leaves the rest more or less to imagination. This is a much better way, since it makes an impression that a bald and unsupported statement cannot do.

Along the same line we quote from a letter from Carl M. Chapin, a newspaper man whose little excursions into the advertising end have been the basis of several paragraphs in this department of late. Mr. Chapin is assistant managing editor of the Waterbury American, writes the photoplay page of that paper and studies house management in his spare time when he is not writing magazine stories. He says:

> And every time I've advertised a film it has brought the goods—no matter what house. And I think that's the whole secret—a good feature, well published, because people are getting weary of sitting through ordinary release day after day on the off chance that some day they'll strike something good. Get something good, tell them its good and explain, in reasonable fashion, why it's good. Don't say merely, "the most stupendous, spectacular, thrilling and expensive film ever produced" because they read that every day. Tell them the Kay-Bee has so many hundred men doing soldier duty every day in the year and that these have been made the nucleus for a Gettysburg army four times (or two or however many times) as large. Tell how the women howled "Oh!" right out in meeting when a man and horse went down a bank in one of those Kay-Bee features. Don't let them think you're copying off the company's prospectus but that you know a good thing and are trying to let them in on it. The same thing is true in press notice writing that is true in fiction—the more sincerely you feel what you're saying the stronger the pulling power. Am I right? And when my house gets so it won't fill without free tickets or premiums I'm going to make up my mind I've exhausted my personal resources and I'll sell out—or get different films.

Picking Up Locals.

Getting back to Mr. Spooner for a moment, we note from his new bills that there has been complaint made of the electric current supplied the town. Several of his bills pick up the incident to explain that their lights are all right or to suggest that the dimly lighted homes be abandoned for the theater. These allusions to some local condition frequently command more attention than the comment on the films, while directing attention to the film advertising.

It would be well to date printed matter. Sometimes a "tonight" bill is picked up the next day and confusion exists, but "Tonight" in large type, followed by the date, even as small as ten point, will sometimes save trouble.

The Lottery Law.

Hay and Nicholas, of the Haynic Theater, Fairmount, Minn., write regarding a recent comment on a scheme of Mr. J. B. Love, of Rome, Ga., as follows:

> In your issue of August 2nd, Page 528, in speaking of the card scheme of Mr. J. B. Love, of Rome, Ga., you say: "Since he gives full value for each ten cents paid, he is not amenable to state or federal lottery laws." This statement is clearly erroneous, and lest it tend to lead some poor exhibitor into serious trouble with the authorities, we believe that you should correct it.
> The lottery laws of all the states were passed at about the same time, the object being to suppress the Louisiana Lottery, their language is almost identical, and they are all vicious. The Minnesota law, which is identical with the federal law, is as follows:
>
> "A lottery is a scheme for the distribution of property by chance among persons who have paid or agreed to pay a valuable consideration for the chance."
> This language has been construed by the courts of last resort in some twenty-five states, and they have gone to extreme lengths in holding that almost anything was a valuable consideration paid by the customer who secured a chance on the drawing. For instance, in one case a grocer allowed each person who purchased goods from him to register a guess as to the number of white beans contained in a bottle, the one guessing nearest the correct number to receive a prize. He was prosecuted for operating a lottery, convicted of a felony and the conviction affirmed.
> Where the ownership of a prize is determined by a drawing, there can be no question but that it is "a distribution of property by chance," and hence a lottery. If, however, the persons who participate in the drawing cannot be held to have "paid or agreed to pay a valuable consideration for the chance," then it is not an illegal lottery. But, where a lottery coupon is attached to the admission ticket and delivered to the patron with such admission ticket, or where, in order to participate, the patron must be present on a paid admission at the time of the drawing, it has universally been held to be an illegal lottery, and in most states it is a felony.
> A scheme which we were using last fall was the subject of investigation by the Attorney General's office, and at that time we had an exhaustive brief on the whole lottery proposition prepared by able counsel. Out of all the cases to be found in the law books there are just two cases where the convictions were set aside,
> Yellowstone Kit. v. State, 16 Am. St. Rep. 36.
> Cross v. People, 32 Pac. 821, > and the text book writers express grave doubt whether the doctrine in these two cases would be followed by other courts.
> We believe that any kind of prize or gift enterprise has a tendency to greatly stimulate business, and we would like to operate Mr. Love's scheme ourselves if the authorities would let us, but we think that you ought not to advise your subscribers that such a scheme is legal.
> In the scheme which we used, and which we believe to be perfectly legal, we detached the prize coupons from the admission tickets and gave one or more to every person who visited the theater during the week, regardless of whether such person paid an admission fee or not. We also gave the coupons away promiscuously on the street, and in the stores and offices, and left them lying around in bunches in cigar stores and other public places. At the end of the week we held a drawing in the usual way, but we held it at the close of the first show and before the second show began, and we took good care not to require any one to pay an admission fee in order to be present at that time. During the latter part of the first show each patron who purchased a ticket was asked whether he wished a ticket for the second show or whether he merely wished to be present at the drawing, and no money was accepted from any person who signified a wish to merely attend the drawing. At the close of the first show the cashier closed the box office, the doorman opened wide the doors, and until the drawing was disposed of each patron who sought to purchase a ticket was informed that the drawing was in progress, that no tickets would be sold until the same was completed, and that he was at liberty to enter the house and participate in the drawing without charge. At the present time we have no remembrance of one who failed to come back after the drawing and purchase a ticket for the second show.

We forgot to state that in distributing the prize coupons to patrons in the theater during the week we did so as they were leaving the theater, thus avoiding the appearance of having sold the prize coupon with the admission ticket.

We fear that this is altogether too long an article to find space in your department, but if you will publish the gist of it it may save some exhibitor a lot of grief.

A Nice Question.

The definition they quote as to what constitutes a lottery is what we had in mind when we stated that this form of card seemed to be outside the law since it may be held that the participants in the drawing cannot be said to have paid a valuable consideration for the chance. They have purchased a ticket for ten cents and have received the value of their money. The legal question lies in whether it can be held that in purchasing the ticket the buyer was influenced by the chance of winning the prize. The burden of proof lies with the prosecution, and this might be a difficult matter to prove. We think that in most states our opinion that adequate return has been made will hold good, but in view of this letter (and we want to thank the writers for their courtesy in setting this matter forth), it would be well to examine the local law most carefully. The Federal law steps in where there is inter-state traffic in tickets or where the mail has been used to distribute tickets or information.

It is the common expedient to replace the lottery with some form of test of skill, but the safest form of gift enterprise is that in which the prizes go to those collecting the greater number of coupons. Much depends upon the attitude of the local and state authorities, since an information must first be lodged, but lotteries in any form are more or less dangerous.

A Philadelphia Syndicate.

The Rialto Publishing Company, Philadelphia, is in the syndicate game, publishing a uniform program for a number of local houses, one of them showing the program in Hebrew type. At present the programs are all four-pagers, carrying comment on four narrow columns on the inside pages, but as the scheme progresses it is possible that the program will expand. It should be possible to give eight or even sixteen pages, the same as the Cameraphone, where the type is set once for all programs, though the Rialto has to prepare three services for Licensed, Mutual and Universal programs. They are using a lucky number feature, the number being printed by a wetter machine instead of the usual blue stamp. It is a start in the right direction, and well handled as far as it has gone.

Driven to Fizzes.

Gaston J. Duryeau, Jr., manager of the Spotlight, the house organ of the Fichtenberg enterprises in New Orleans, writes:

> Your lengthy and much appreciated criticism in The Moving Picture World of a few weeks ago was duly read and I must confess it took several gin fizzes to revive me from the effects of such an unexpected railing, and it was not until I had read your views several times that I began to see things your way.
> Seriously speaking, while there were one or two of your suggestions I did not agree with, I think you will see by the last four copies I am sending that your criticism as a whole has produced an entirely new magazine, and much for the better, I should say.

Mr. Duryeau wanted to know what we thought of his publication, so we told him. It didn't make very good reading, but it seems to have made a better magazine. We have already spoken of the new photoplay department and question box. The photoplay writers are getting real help from the department, for it is run by Julian Louis LaMothe, himself a writer. There is plenty of general gossip for the fans and the advertising is not permitted to become too intrusive. This is the point where so many fail. They start off with plenty of stuff, but when the ads come in the reading matter is curtailed until the advertiser receives no value. The Spotlight has not contracted this habit and we hope that it does not. If the present proportion of advertising, reading notice and general matter is maintained it will keep on being just about right.

Advertising "Beauty and the Beast."

James G. Tomlin, of the Dreamland Amusement Company, Shreveport, La., writes:

> On the 15th inst we had the film "Beauty and the Beast" and wanting to advertise it strong we started thinking. Then we hired an automobile, put a bear head and costume on a boy and dressed up a girl as beauty and placed them on the rear seat of the car with a banner on each side; we started out to do the job. You should have been here and tried to get a seat; and we seat four hundred too.

The idea is applicable to other subjects than this, but "Beauty and the Beast" lends itself particularly well to street work. Make a note, if you have not already had the reels. If you have, adapt it to something else.

Still There.

S. E. Wall is still on the job, hustling his brains to make new business. He has a new house, and while his most recent scheme is not new, we give his letter to remind those who have forgotten it.

> It has been at least six months since I have burdened this department with any of my offerings, and just to prove that I am still extant, I arise to remark, that I get many valuable hints from this department. Business is very good at West Jefferson, playing pictures and orchestra (no vaudeville) and I opened a new place in Cedarville July 1, and by the way, that was all that kept me from being a caller at your shop in little old New York during the convention; had my transportation and all arrangements made, but at the last minute had to give it up and stay with the new venture.
> Here is one I pulled off last night with the co-operation of the ladies of the Methodist church, and by the way, getting in good with the church ladies in less than thirty days isn't half bad, considering the fact that I am a stranger in town, but after a little quiet inquiry I found out that the Methodist ladies were raising funds for a worthy cause and I went to them and offered to assist them by giving them 50 per cent. of the tickets they sold (outside of the house) for Monday night's show, agreeing to furnish a program that would be consistent for the occasion, and say, that bunch of women sure did peddle some tickets. We packed them in till there was no S. R. O. The program for the evening consisted of the "Crimson Cross" in three parts and a good breezy comedy, which made a very nice offering for ten cents, pleasing the audience, the ladies and incidentally myself; after we settled up the ladies were about $20 to the good on a deal for which they were very profuse in their thanks.
> Of course I realize this is an old worn out method, but it's all right at that and I have done pretty much the same thing at West Jefferson on different occasions with the same satisfactory results.

We Missed Mr. Arnold.

S. A. Arnold writes us that he was at the exposition, but did not see us. Anyone who was at the exposition and didn't see us needs to consult an oculist. We are tall both up and down and across and plainly visible to the naked eye, and we spent about two-thirds of our time in the Palace all that week. We are particularly sorry to have missed Mr. Arnold, for he is one of the real thinkers and he hits the bullseye most every time if he does live in a little town like Mena, Arkansas.

The Mena school appropriation is not as large as the school needs, and Professor E. L. Dean, principal of the school system, is trying to augment by private subscription. Like Abou Ben Adhem, Mr. Arnold's name leads the list. He has promised for the term of one year to give his receipts one day each month to the school fund. The result is an editorial comment and an appreciative letter from Professor Dean in the same issue; not couched as an advertisement, but as a commendation of Mr. Arnold's enterprise. This is the sort of advertising that counts. In the furtherance of the public good, Mr. Arnold links his entertainment almost as part of the school system. And we do not think that it was just advertising, either, that led to Mr. Arnold's action.

Looking over the advertising, we note that Mr. Arnold has "Special seats for 2,000 people." Going some?

Rounding Up the Absent.

Harry (M. P.) Waldron, of the Langdon and Electric Theatres, Langdon, S. D., sends in a couple of advertising stunts. One is a circular on linen paper that starts off:

> THERE IS SOMETHING WRONG.
> There are 1,246 people in this town and yet one night lately we only showed to 297 paid admissions. Now allowing for one man who always takes his bath the 3rd Tuesday of every month, and two boys whose shirts were being washed and, therefore, couldn't go out, that still leaves 946 people to account for, after deducting the above-mentioned 297. So far none of them have come around to explain their absence. If it was only 7 or 8 we wouldn't mind, but 946 admissions at 15 cents amounts to $141.80 which we didn't get, and which we can't afford to lose on one night's business.
> We have concluded most of the 946 didn't know how good the show is. Now the show is good, but we don't like to talk about it and hate to mention it in this way. But the fact remains. We don't have to prove it. We cheerfully admit it. And it is getting better every day.

The other is in familiar season pass form but reads.

A New Schedule.

It's been so long since the Arcade Theater, Tientsin, China, sent in any advertising that it seems almost a novelty. They are working a new idea now. They show eight pictures for half a dollar. The first part of the program starts at 8:30 and after two reels there is an intermission of fifteen minutes. At 9:15 five pictures are run. After another intermission the eighth reel is run and the first two repeated for the benefit of late comers.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Mr. Plimpton on Two Reels.

MR. HORACE G. PLIMPTON, manager of Negative Production for the Edison Company, wants real two-reels. The Edison Company was the first to buy largely of book rights and it appears from Mr. Plimpton's letter that up to the present their multiple reels have all been .made from novels. The script which he sent is not printed, since it. is merely a memorandum of the action, supplementing the director's study of the novel, and so not in true photoplay form. It was divided into parts and the scenes of each separately numbered, but Mr. Plimpton is less particular as to the exact form, so that there is a story there. He writes:

> In the first place, the Edison Studio wants plots above the ordinary for two-reel subjects. We want to draw a sharp line in accepting subjects of this kind and in no case to consider a subject for two thousand feet which could be told in one. In subjects of this kind, the plot and the name of the author count for considerable, in my opinion; that is to say, we feel that the two-reel subjects should have an advertising value.
> So far as the form goes, it seems to us best that it should be submitted in one completed scenario. It is not even necessary that it be divided by the author into the first and second reel, although probably it would be better if the author had a definite idea as to where he meant the first reel to end and the second one to start. If this is indicated, it would, I think, be better to number the scenes in the second reel separately from the first, beginning again at one. However, as stated above, this is immaterial to us. If the author can send us a good two-reel scenario, he may number the scenes consecutively from one to the last number and need not even break the subject into the two reel. It is our experience that sometimes this can be done better after the film is looked at than before.
> I am inclosing for whatever use you care to make of it the scenario which was prepared in our own studio and for our own use, of our first two-reel release, "The Mystery of West Sedgwick," originally called "The Gold Bag." This was prepared by us from the novel, and therefore is in condensed form and solely for the guidance of the director and the actors and others concerned. As a matter of fact, we have not yet accepted any outside two-reel scenarios. Such as we have done have been based on previously copyrighted work.

Jones Explains.

Marc Edmund Jones explains, in reply to a recent paragraph in this department relative to the "Association" of the Photoplay Magazine, that the scheme is merely a part of an advertising campaign and that the deficit will be made good from the advertising appropriation. He writes that the initial fee of one dollar covers all criticism given for a year and that there is no limit as to the number of scripts, so that they are heal scripts and not monstrosities. When it is apparent that an auhor cannot succeed he will be put out of his misery as painlessly as possible. There is to be no actual organization formed and the clearing house scheme has wisely been dropped.

Killing the Open Market.

Some weeks ago we quoted a New York editor on the practice of some school in telling its pupils to write the studios and ask just what they want. Now comes a letter from Richard V. Spencer along the same lines. We quote also a few lines of personal gossip. Lots of us were looking forward to seeing him again this season. He made a host of friends last year. Mr. Spencer writes:

> I expected to get back this year on a vacation, but in the last few days have been forced to change my plans, owing to the fact that my mother's health is not the best and she does not want to take the long trip. Am leaving here August 1st for a two months' vacation. Am going up to Salt Lake City, Denver, Yellowstone National Park, the Canadian Rockies (probably Banff or some other mountain resort), and return via Seattle and Frisco. Expect to get some good trout fishing and hunting and forget scenarios in the meantime.
> The Broncho, Kay-Bee, and Keystone Studios have been deluged with a flood of useless correspondence, such as samples which I am inclosing, coming, no doubt, from some correspondence school pupils. These inquiries are a waste of time on the part of the authors, and make a lot of unnecessary bother for the different producing firms to whom they are directed. If authors wish to know what class of pictures the different producers are staging, why on earth don't they watch the different brands on the screen? If the companies do special work, such as costume stuff, they either hire their scenario departments to do it, or arrange for it with contract authors. Perhaps a word to authors in your columns in the "World" would go a long ways to end this nuisance.

Both of the samples sent are addressed to 12 Union Square, New York City, instead of to Los Angeles, and this sample of up-to-dateness is characteristic of these schools. They make no effort to keep abreast of the times. The letters are identical in form, though one comes from Connecticut and the other from Indianapolis. They read:

> I will thank you to advise me the nature of your present requirements, if you wish comedy, melodrama, Western, cowboy, Indian, rural, historical, Biblical or society drama and the prices you are paying for acceptable photoplays.
> I inclose self addressed and stamped envelope for reply, and thanking you for your courtesy, I am, respectfully yours.

We have already said that one company lists these inquiries on the grounds that a correspondence school pupil is not worth bothering about. It is evident that the Broncho-Kay-Bee brands regard the inquirers with no greater favor and we know of three other companies that are taking much the same stand.

It is bad enough that the correspondence schools should "graduate" hundreds of incompetents to flood the studios with such a mass of worthless scripts that the occasional good story is lost, but when the pupils are instructed to write a letter that no person with the slightest idea of the business would write, it is apt to prove the straw that will break the camel's back and presently we shall hear of half a dozen studios that are "not buying" simply because they cannot bother with the thousands of worthless scripts that are submitted along with the tens of good ones.

Few readers of the World are among the offenders, but if there are among our readers any pupils who have been offended in this respect, will they please take notice that they can get an idea of a company's wants through reading the stories of the films in the back of this paper and through watching the screen.

Will the school offending please also note. We know that most of the alleged "teachers" read this department with profit if not with pleasure.

Don't Sign.

Be careful what you sign when you get in with the correspondence schools. We understand that one contract is now so worded that while you seem under no obligation to take the complete course, you find that you must. It is seldom that an intelligent person takes the full course, and few intelligent persons take any part of it, but now and then someone gets stung and finds that the sting is severe. Do not sign anything and you'll be safe. Don't even write them and you'll be safer yet.

Branch Out.

Learn to vary your offering. Don't write along the same lines week after week and expect to keep on selling. Just the other day an author wanted to know why he could not sell. We found he had written four plays, three of which were precisely the same thing. The stories were differently worded, but the idea was precisely the same in all. Another writer offered three plots all with the same central theme. They were not offered as variants of the same theme, but as the groundwork for three different stories.

The thing to do is to strip your story of all its frillings and look at the skeleton. If there is too much of a family resemblance between the various skeletons, drop the idea and strive for a new form. Try to have each story as different as possible from all others. Give each one an individual twist. It's the only way to get ahead. Editors come to know the man who has only three or four master plots to work with.

Off and On.

We have been having quite a little discussion lately as to the use of "off" and "on" in place of "entrance" and "exit" in the case of exterior scenes. It is argued that entrance and exit are terms of the stage improperly used where a stage is not employed, but we fail to see the logic of such argument. For the time being the exterior location, or such part of it as lies within the camera lines is the stage, wherefore it should follow that the terms of the stage are properly employed. The matter is of no great moment, but since "exit" is more convenient than "goes off" there is no reason why it should not be employed merely because a scene is made out of doors instead of under a roof. The important point is to have the action clearly and intelligibly written. The exact form of the wording is unimportant.

THE KALEM SCRIPT.

(Concluded from last week.)

Scene 16. Exterior of sheriff's house.

Sheriff comes into scene and extracts a little package, a present for Kitty. "This will tickle her," he smiles. He holds package behind back and slowly opens door.

Scene 17. Interior of sheriff's house.

Continuation of Scene 15. Dan bending over Kitty. Sheriff appears in door. He is startled. Here is the man who loved his wife, and now both are seen in a somewhat compromising situation. Sheriff slowly comes to table. Raises Kitty and turns to Dan, asking him what it means. Dan can say nothing without implicating Kitty. Kitty is horrified to think her husband may learn her secret. Sheriff sternly motions for Dan to leave. Dan slowly exits. Sheriff stands by Kitty. "Do you love that man?" Kitty insists that she does not. "Then what does this mean?" Kitty has nothing to say.

Scene 18. Roadway near sheriff's.

Dan crosses scene in serious thought. Feels of his gun and proceeds out of scene.

Scene 19. Before Post Office as in former scene.

Mason saunters in from one side, Dan from another. They meet near foreground. Dan catches Mason by shoulder and turns him around. Dan takes out his watch. Holds it in his palm. Draws his gun:

Sub-title: "I'LL GIVE YOU JUST ONE HOUR TO GET OUT OF TOWN!"

Mason sneers and exits. Dan pockets his gun.

Sub-title: THE TROUBLE MAKER'S CUPIDITY IS AROUSED.

Scene 20. Near grocery store.

Sheriff rides up. A citizen accosts him and he dismounts. Citizen pays him some money. Sheriff surprised. "What is this?" Citizen draws out letter and hands it to Sheriff. Sheriff reads:

Cashier: Stone Gulch Bank.
This authorizes you to pay to Sheriff Norton $500 for protecting recent bullion shipment.
Yours truly,
ACME MINING COMPANY.

Sheriff nods his approval. Mason has sauntered into scene and witnessed the affair. Sheriff rides out. Mason follows.

Scene 21. Roadway near Sheriff's. As in former scenes.

Sheriff rides across scene slowly. When he has disappeared Mason runs in, somewhat out of breath, and he has followed the Sheriff on foot. He cautiously follows after Sheriff.

Scene 22. Exterior of Sheriff's house.

Sheriff rides up and calls. Kitty comes out. He hands her money and, explaining that he has business to attend to, asks her to put the money away. Mason appears and stealthfully watches. Sheriff rides off. Kitty goes into house. Mason goes to window.

Scene 23. Interior of Sheriff's house, as in former scenes.

Kitty is placing money in drawer. (Action timed with former scene in which she made exit before Mason went to window) Mason's face appears at window and watches.

Scene 24. Exterior of Sheriff's house.

Mason turns from window and softly turning door knobs, enters.

Scene 25. Interior of Sheriff's house.

Kitty starts as Mason comes in door. Instinctively she turns her back to the drawer where money is hidden and takes defiant stand. He pushes her aside. They struggle.

Scene 26. Exterior of Sheriff's house.

Dan rides slowly into scene. Consults watch. "It's time I looked after that rowdy!" He is about to start on when he hears a cry in the house. He quickly dismounts and goes to window.

Scene 27. Interior of Sheriff's house.

Kitty and Mason struggling. Mason is nearest window. Dan's face is seen at window.

Scene 28. Close-up of window at Sheriff's house.

Dan draws his revolver, takes careful aim and fires. He would start away, but has second thought. Extracts paper and stub of pencil and scratches a few lines. He places note on window sill.

Scene 29. Wider angle view of Sheriff's house—exterior.

Dan rushes away from window, plunges on horse, turns it about and speeds away in direction from which he came.

Scene 30. Interior of Sheriff's house, as in former scene.

Mason is stretched out on floor. Kitty, horrified, stands over him. She rushes to window to see who fired the shot and finds note. A ghost of a smile comes to her face as she recognizes the writer's name. She clasps the note in her hand and comes to table. Overcome, she sinks in chair, burying her face, the hand clutching the note resting on the table.

Scene 31. Exterior of Sheriff's house.

Sheriff rides up and enters house.

Scene 32. Interior of Sheriff's house.

Mason on floor. Kitty at table as at close of Scene 30. Sheriff enters. He is greatly startled at sight of body and Kitty apparently unconscious. He raises her up and asks what has happened. She hands him note. He reads:

Sheriff:
I shot this cur who tried to steal your money and attack your wife. If you want to catch me, follow the Elkhorn Trail. Best wishes to you and Kitty. Dan.

The Sheriff sees the true situation and takes Kitty in his arms. (LET THIS RUN A FEW FEET. THEN SHOW SHERIFF AND KITTY RAISE MASON, WHO SHOWS SIGNS OF LIFE. THIS BUSINESS CAN BE TRIMMED OFF, BUT WILL BE ON HAND IN CASE CENSORS DEMAND THAT WE SHOW THAT MASON WAS NOT KILLED.)

Scene 33. Rough exterior location. Mountain side.

Dan rides up. Stops, looks back and sadly smiles. Then he slowly continues his journey as the scene fades out.

The End.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

M. F.—It is not possible to reply, in this department, to any inquiry that requires the reading of the script. Leaders are necessary only where the action is not self explanatory. If you cannot write on other than the "seamy" side of life, better give up writing. You are wasting your time if you cannot lift your stories above the filth.

F. H. R.—You can write a comedy and a drama on the same basic plot if you can develop the stories in such a way that they are not alike. We could write a comedy and a drama from the plot you mention, but it would take rather adroit dodging. In addressing a script to a magazine, simply address it to the magazine. They will understand that it is a script, and that it is offered for sale. Most magazines are made up of the work of outside contributors, though each editor has his favorites. There are few "staff" fiction writers on magazines. If you will state your questions more tersely, you'll be better liked by the Answers Man, and give a paragraph to each question, please.

E. B.—We know nothing of the concern you mention. We do not like its looks. Of course its literature is convincing.

B. I. S.—We cannot tell you the location of the "first picture show." We think that the first showing of motion pictures (in film), was made on lower Broadway, in New York. Others claim that W. T. Rock started the first picture show (on the screen), in New Orleans, in 1896. The Biograph theaters in California date back of the present photoplay theaters, yet it is stated that the first picture theater was started in Memphis. Personally, the Answers Man doesn't know, and knows no one who does know, but he inclines to the belief that the first Edison slot machines were publicly exhibited in New York City.

SEVERAL INQUIRERS—A Los Angeles correspondent supplies the information that the leading woman in "The Sorrowful Shore" was Miss Olive Fuller Golden, daughter of the late George Fuller Golden, one of the best vaudeville monologuists of his day, and the founder of the White Rats.

J. A. F.—The Kay-Bee identifier was in the hospital when the film first mentioned was released, and never caught up with it. Please name the players in some other film if you can. Miss Pearl Sindelear, now with Pathe, was Miss McDowell's sister in "The Wrong Bottle." Jack Dillon was the faker in "The Tenderfoot's Money." In "The Cure," the employer was William J. Butler. We think you allude to C. L. Barr, not Carr. His first name has never been given, but instead, his studio nickname of "Camille."

A. R. H.—Give your name and address if you expect more answers. Jack Lane, in "The Lure of the Violin," was played by E. L. Morrow.

M. M. M.—Harry Carey played the parts first mentioend. Miss Nora Talmadge became engaged to Mr. Delaney in "Solitaires." Mr. MacDermott is still with Edison. You ask questions in a way that makes it easy for the Answers Man, but please give the name of the character where you can, as sometimes "the girl who," etc., involves looking up the synopsis.

E. B.—We have not the slightest idea why the company returned your script unopened. Why not ask them? They are more likely to know. It is a better plan to submit one script at a time, though more may be sent if desired. The idea of the single script is, that it is fresh off the machine. Three or four suggest that you are hawking the rejections of other companies.

RUBENA.—Why that cruel postcard? Your story came back from Universal because they now read for the Victor section. We think Mr. Jones is not with Lubin. Al Green was the son in "The Reformation of Dad." Mr. Hedlund is with another company now. Write Mr. Moore, or his barber, about his hair. We pass. We have not enough hair on our own head to pose as an expert.

CREOLE BELLE—That's more like the name of a steamer than an inquirer. Alex. Gaden was Poleon, the trapper, in the play of that title. We have not the Bison casts. In "An Eye for an Eye," Jack O'Brien played Tom Kirby. Miss Ethel Phillips was the stenographer in "The Attorney for the Defense."

C. J. T.—A photoplay script carries no dialogue. The players invent conversation to fit the situation. Talking pictures carry full dialogue and business. Each time you change the place where the picture is made it is a scene. You do not "flash into another scene," but stop one scene, write in another and then a third, which takes up the action of the first scene. In the example you cite, you show, at the time of happening, the mother's tribulations, then, at the proper time, we can guess what she is saying because we have already seen it. Otherwise, you would "vision" this stuff into the station scene, which would increase the cost, but not the effect gained. Better send for a copy of "Technique of the Photoplay." The panoramic effect to which you allude is generally called a "panorama." It is both a noun and a verb, that is, you "panoram" the camera to get a "panoram." It is done with a cog wheel and circular rack in the tripod head, or the camera is mounted in an auto, according to circumstances. You do not state your question very clearly. Back numbers may be had in bound volume at $1.50 for each three months' volume for the past couple of years.

J. A. M.—The real "Shorty," is Jack Hamilton, but apparently you refer to Charles Avery, who is sometimes called Shorty in the Keystone leaders. The fat man is Roscoe Arbuckle. We do not place the "effeminate man."

J. K.—Thanks for the clipping. Mr. Kerrigan played the part mentioned.

J. S. B.—To use a copyrighted story or play, you must have the permission of the holder of the copyright. Permission might be gained from the holder, but it would not pay you to gamble in copyright rights.

F. F. S.—Exchange rentals vary so greatly that it is not possible to give even approximate replies to your questions. Your theater question is equally impossible.

Operators' Union Directory, I. A. T. S. E.

NOTICE—Each union is entitled to have its roster of officers, meeting nights, etc., listed here once per year, free of cost. Preserve this list as it will not be republished. The mail address of the secretary should be included in each list, and the address of regular meeting place, if any.

M. P. M. O. Auxiliary No. 3., Stockton, California.

H. V. Kershner, president; L. C. Williams, vice-president; J. W. Southwick, secretary-treasurer, P. O. Box 909, Stockton, California; H. Serrano, sergeant-at-arms; H. V. Kershner, J. J. Satterfield, J. W. Southwick, W. E. Scheaneman, Executive Board.

The Convention.

I have purposely delayed saying anything about the Convention. When I was a boy and did something that compelled my dear old dad to apply a dose of hickory oil, he always waited a day or two until he got over his "mad" before he exercised the birch. Since I have grown up, I have been often told to count one hundred before saying anything when I was angry; it is a pretty good scheme, too.

The 21st Annual Convention of the I. A. T. S. E. is a matter of history The legislation, viewed as a whole, was good. That this is true is due in very large measure to the wise recommendations set forth by President Shay in his annual report. On the other hand, the body did one thing which was very far from being a credit to the very small majority which forced the act in question through, and I am informed that a very large portion of that majority is now heartily sorry for what it did. Many have voluntarily said that they voted under a misapprehension of the facts and regret their act.

President Shay has again proven his title to be ranked among the leaders of men. His report was a marvel of concise statements and recommendations. His final unanimous election proved that his opponents lacked the nerve and sand necessary to pull off what they came to Seattle primed for. The politicians from a certain city, aside from a first triumph, which hurt themselves far worse than it injured anyone else, fell flat. The better element of the Convention soon got wise to them and their methods and —they lost out. One of the important and far-reaching results of the Convention was a closer affiliation between the I. A. and the American Federation of Musicians. President Shay's recommendation reducing the Executive Board from 7 to 5, and placing organizers in the field was adopted; this ought to, and doubtless will, result in much good.

The changing of conventions from annual to bi-annual was one of the things advocated by this department and recommended by President Shay. It was adopted, and the next convention will be held two years hence in Chicago.

For the first time the operators secured direct representation on the Executive Board. Brother Cannavan, of St. Louis, M. P. O. Union 143, being elected Third Vice-President. The operators also have another representative on the Board, from the Newark local, though, as he also belongs to the stage employees and, hence, cannot be entirely credited to the operators. I do not recall his name at this moment. The operators held the balance of power in the Convention, and have every reason to feel proud of what they accomplished, though even more might have been done had not a portion of the operators' delegation wasted their time in political manœuvres. On the whole, however, the operators have good reason to congratulate themselves on the showing made.

The Convention, however, did one thing which deserves severe criticism; viz.: it adopted a resolution forbidding any member from publishing, or furnishing for publication, any articles in any way criticising the acts of the I. A. T. S. E. or even expressing any opinion as to the past, present, or future policy of the organization, or anything designed to instruct operators in their craft. This is a direct attempt to suppress free speech—a thing labor men have long fought for the right to exercise. It is an act as foolish as it will be ineffective. A man who would be deterred from giving voice to an opinion from fear of a penalty attached to such a law as this would not have any opinion worth expressing anyhow; moreover, a fine assessed under this law could not be collected if the member saw fit to fight it. When an organization, or individual, gets to the point where it fears honest criticism, or the education of the craft it represents, it stands in need of considerable fixing. The I. A. T. S. E. is not, however, in that condition and, let us hope, never will be. The delegates who introduced this law, as well as those voting for it, have no reason to feel proud of their work. It is a kind of legislation that might have been expected fifty years ago.

Direct charters were granted to both the Philadelphia and the New York operators, so that the dove of peace can once more hover over the operating rooms of those two municipalities.

It is not necessary to go into the details of the work of the Convention since the official report will be out shortly and will, I suppose, be mailed to all unions.

The I. A. T. S. E. has every cause to congratulate itself on the excellent staff of officers elected, and particularly on the re-election of Charles Shay as International President. The International Secretary's office has been removed to New York City, so that the offices of the president and secretary are now under one roof in the Gaiety Theater Building, sixth floor, 1547 Broadway, in the heart of the theatrical district.

New York Moving Picture Operators' Union No. 306.

On Wednesday, August 6th, the old Branch 2 of Local Union 35 met in what proved to be its last session, since, as soon as the meeting was called to order a new Direct Charter was delivered to it by International President Shay, whereupon Branch 2 of Local Union 35, I. A. T. S. E. immediately and automatically became Local Union No. 306, I. A. T. S. E., and thus the hopes and wishes of the New York operators were at last realized.

The credit for this charter will probably be claimed by a New York operator named Goldblatt but, as a matter of plain fact, the efforts of this individual have only served to delay, rather than bring about, the granting of a direct charter.

I wish also at this time to go on record as saying that while the time is now ripe for the action which has been taken, the granting of a direct charter previous to this time would not in any way have benefited the New York men and would, in my judgment, have been a detriment rather than a help. I wish also to say, that, regardless of all talk and report to the contrary, Local Union 35 has treated the New York operators fairly in the past. I am aware that many will dispute this, but that does not alter the fact. Had a direct charter been granted to the old auxiliary the result would, in my judgment, have been confusion worse confounded, since the only steadying influence, Local Union 35, would have been taken away, and the old auxiliary was no more fitted to govern itself than a child would be to govern its appetite when turned loose with ten one-pound boxes of candy. The present body, however (old Branch 2, now Local 306), is an entirely different proposition, and I believe that it is going to succeed and be a powerful factor for the improvement of conditions in the operating rooms of Greater New York City.

The meeting was a very large one, so much so that difficulty was had in securing seats. International President Charles Shay, International Secretary Lee M. Hart, Organizer John J. Fanning, Chicago; Organizer F. G. Leamaster, Denver, and Harold Williams, Business Agent, Local 35, New York City, were present. The charter was received with vociferous cheers, and a vote of thanks was extended to all those delegates in the Convention who helped in securing the same. Also to International President Shay. And let me say right here that Charles Shay deserves more credit than any other one man for the granting of the Direct Charter. The Secretary was instructed to extend to Brothers Delliver and Boyle, San Francisco, M. & M. O., L. U. 162, the thanks of L. U. 306 for the stand they took in the Convention.

F. H. Richardson made his report as delegate to the Convention, and recommended that inasmuch as the body had got what it desired, viz.: a direct charter, no steps be taken to secure the return of expenses of the delegate. His report and recommendation were adopted unanimously, and he was given a hearty round of applause and a vote of thanks for his work in Seattle.

A carefully selected committee was appointed to consider all matters brought up by the new condition and the books will now be opened, for a limited time, at a $5 initiation, to all competent moving picture operators in Greater New York, who will be invited to show their good faith by coming into the organization, now that the long sought direct charter has been obtained. The editor of this department desires to congratulate the New York operators on the receipt of the charter and to earnestly advise every operator in Greater New York to affiliate with Local Union 306, I. A. T. S. E. The union may rest assured that it will have the support of this department in all things which are right, and the Projection Department wishes every success and God-speed for the future.

Salt Lake City.

Brothers J. W. Stacy, president; N. Offer, vice-president; W. R. Martin, business agent; and R. W. Wardrop, of Salt Lake City, M. P. O. Union No. 250, met me at the depot at the unholy hour of 6:30 a. m. As I was obliged to leave at 4:50 p. m. the same day, the boys got busy and after a visit to the General Film Company, where we were shown over Manager L. Marcus' up-to-date exchange, we, in company with Manager Marcus and brothers Wadrop, Martin, Worthen and Offer, put in the forenoon motoring around the city.

This was followed by an organ recital at the Mormon Tabernacle, which was indeed a thing to be long remembered. Then came lunch and a gathering, of such of the boys as were off duty, at the Rex Theater, when the editor was calmly invited to stand right up in meeting and make a speech. We met C. J. Davis, manager Rex Theater, whom Brother Stacy, his operator, declares is the real thing. Mr. Davis must plead guilty to two serious indictments, viz: he is a most pleasant gentleman, and president of the Salt Lake City Exhibitors' League.

At 4:50 we again took train, and it was with genuine regret that we said good-bye. The Salt Lake boys are a live, wideawake bunch who have in the past and will in the future, we feel very sure, render a good account of themselves, both as an organization and individually. And by the way, Manager Marcus, of the Salt Lake branch of the General Film Company, is a live wire, and one mighty good fellow as well. A description of the American Theater, Salt Lake City, will be published later.

Automatic Arc.

While in Seattle, Mr. Crane, of that city, requested me to call at his office and examine an automatic arc mechanism of which he is the inventor. While I, of course, complied with the request, it was with a preconceived idea that it would prove to be a waste of time. My idea was anything else but right. It was altogether wrong, for Mr. Crane has accomplished what he set out to do, and has done it in a thoroughly unique, but entirely practical way. He resets the carbons by passing a thin copper plate directly between them, breaking the arc of course, and at the same time releasing both the upper and lower carbons, the upper carbon dropping down, and the lower one being forced up against the plate. This, of course, extinguishes the arc, but as the copper plate is withdrawn, it is struck again, so that the effect on the screen is merely a winking of the light, due to the rapidity with which the action is performed. The aforesaid copper plate revolves and is, of course, exactly central up and down, with the center of the condenser so that the carbons are necessarily exactly central, up and down, with the condenser after being reset, and there seems to be nothing that could affect this centering except a crooked carbon, which might throw the arc a trifle to one side, but inasmuch as carbons are to all intents and purposes perfectly straight, this is, I believe, a negligible quantity. Mr. Crane has tried the device on amperage up to 60, and it works perfectly. He has given it very rough usage in order to develop weak spots, and now has it in such shape that I watched it project a perfect stereo picture for a considerable time without a single flaw in the light, and I see no reason why this perfection could not be continued indefinitely, with only an occasional stop for insertion of new carbons.

Mr. Crane has also, in conjunction with this lamp, invented a very practical method of automatically handling stereopticon slides for continuous advertising projection. This device consists of two large metal wheels, each of which holds a considerable number of slides. These wheels set very nearly horizontal and directly in front of the lens, one a little above and the other a little below, the light projecting between the wheels, which are something like 3 feet in diameter. The wheels set on a slight angle to allow for the passage of light rays. Around the edges are arranged slides, which stand on edge in the holders, and the machine takes the slides alternately from either wheel, depositing the used slide in the wheel opposite to that from which it was taken. The whole thing appears to be a thoroughly practical device. It is operated by an electric motor, and, by the way, it requires a small motor to operate Mr. Crane's arc lamp.

In my opinion this device will be very successful for show window advertising and the like, and I am inclined to believe it might be adapted to the projection of moving pictures. but on this point I do not like to pronounce judgment until the thing has been placed in a moving picture theater and given a thorough try out, under actual working conditions, for a considerable period of time. However, this much I can say, viz.: Mr. Crane must, and he says he can, shorten the period of resetting very considerably in order to adapt the device to moving pictures. Personally, I am rather inclined to believe the lamp will not fill the bill for city m. p. work, but, be that as it may, if Mr. Crane can materially shorten the period of resetting, I believe there is a field for his lamp in the small towns, and certainly its introduction into that field would work no hardship on the operators, since in these very small towns there is no possibility of employing an operator, at least at a decent salary, anyway.

Denver.

Dear old Denver! Our train was something over three hours late, and I marched up to the gateway of the Union depot, expecting to pass through unknown and unmolested; but that was merely another dream, for there protruded from the atmosphere a big bunch of hands, behind which I discerned the smiling countenances of Ed. Shields, chairman of Entertainment Committee Local Union 230, I. A. T. S. E.; L. M. McQuonn, R. J. Addington, Charles Decker, Gay White, and R. T. Waddington, the same constituting the committee appointed by the local to receive and entertain your humble servant. After the usual introductions, and the smoking of the pipe of peace, I was escorted into 17th Street and introduced to a big gasoline wagon, on the back of which was plastered a banner announcing to all and sundry that "This is Richardson's car." The rest of the evening would be best represented by a series of exclamation points, or a picture of a miniature cyclone. Although it was 11:30 p. m., the big Curtis Street houses remained open and the managers awaited our coming. In rapid succession I viewed the Isis, Paris, Colonial, Bison, Empress, and Princess theaters, all on Curtis Street, after which the union held its regular bi-monthly session, followed by a Dutch lunch at 3:30 a. m. After several maneuvers, and the use of a crowbar, finally I succeeded in prying loose and retired to enjoy the room engaged by the committee at the Albany Hotel.

The Denver boys are a quiet bunch, in the sense that one hears very little of them until one gets there; but you may take it from me, when you arrive there are doings, with a capital "D." And now let me say a few words about the Curtis Street district, which is the moving picture center of Denver. For two blocks, between 16th and 18th Streets, it is a miniature great White Way, and nowhere have I seen theater fronts which could excel, or even compare, with the Curtis Street houses in beauty and brilliancy of illumination by night. Several of the large houses have their entire fronts painted a pure gloss white, and at night the entire facade is a blaze of light, the brilliancy of which is accentuated by the whiteness of the walls. Some of the houses have other effects which have been worked out with much taste and are things of great beauty. At Broadway and 42d Street, New York, one stands in the middle of a perfect geyser of light, but even that marvelous district cannot show the real beauty of illumination I viewed on Curtis Street, though, of course, there is no comparison as to quantity. It would be manifestly impossible to describe all the really good houses in this district, therefore I shall take for example the Isis Theater, which is the newest and, therefore, probably, in some ways, the most up-to-date. This house seats 2,000. It has a huge amphitheater, tastefully decorated in cream and light green, with stenciled borders. There is a charmingly decorated ladies' retiring-room, gentlemen's lavatories, and all conveniences usually found in high class theaters. The long foyer is covered with heavy carpeting, and there are many pots of plants, which add greatly to the scheme of decoration. The picture is 20 feet wide, the screen being a terra cotta wall coated with plaster, over which is spread some sort of a compound, the secret of which the management did not care to divulge. Around the screen is a row of lights behind ornamented heavily frosted glass. These lights are, of course, only on during the time the picture is off, and, inasmuch as they produce no glare whatever, the effect is pleasing. In the flare of the proscenium are squares of ornamental tinted glass, behind which are lights.

The house has an eight-piece orchestra, and a large pipe organ, the keyboard of the latter being located clear up against the back wall of the balcony. The ventilation system consists of a huge 8-foot intake fan, and a 4½-foot exhaust fan, both located in the basement. These fans are of such a size that they can produce a regular gale of air through the house, if it is so desired. The intakes, or openings through which the air enters the auditorium, are located about 8 feet from the floor and the exhaust outlets are at the floor level, there being also ventilators in the ceiling. The operating room of this house is 8x10 feet in size, with a very high ceiling and a large opening through the roof. The walls are of hollow tile. Over the back wall of the operating room is the house switchboard, and a supplementary switchboard controlling the front lights. At the left is a motor generator set of 50 ampere capacity, bolted to the floor, and above it a 45 ampere G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier, the two being connected with a double-throw switch, so that the change from one to the other can be instantly made. Immediately in front of the operator are two ammeters, and a field rheostat controlling the motor generator set. The port in the front wall is about 3 feet by 5 feet. The room is in charge of E. A. Shields, chief operator, and H. H. Thomas, his assistant. The Isis is just installing a sound effect contrivance to be operated by compressed air, but it is not yet working, so I cannot give details concerning it. This magnificent house is managed by S. L. Baxter, whom I had the pleasure of meeting, and who is a live, thoroughly up-to-date manager, as is evidenced by the house he controls.

And now imagine, if you can, viewing four reels of first run pictures in this splendid theater for the sum of 5 cents, anywhere in the house, including the boxes. It is scandalous. This theater represents a large investment, and, in my humble judgment and opinion, the prices should be 10, 15 and 25 cents, but, while its manager agrees with this view, it seems that, although they have tried several times, they have been unable to raise the admission to even 10 cents, and thus we see the result of educating the public to expect a half dollar's worth of value for five cents. It is very easy to do it, but it is a hard proposition to re-educate them into a willingness to pay what the commodity is worth, even though the same number of reels be worth a great deal more than it was in the days when the five cent proposition was put into effect, due to improvement in production, projection and the theaters themselves. However, prices will have to be raised in Denver sooner or later, and the sooner it is done the better it will be for all concerned. This thing of operating really splendid houses like the Isis, Paris, Iris, Colonial, Princess and others on a five cent basis is absurd, and a thing which does not speak overly well for the combined intelligence of Denver managers. I am informed that the majority of the managers would like to cut out the nickel business, but there are certain ones, or rather a certain one, who will not consent, and thus all are forced to yield to the preference of a small minority, when that preference is to the detriment of the business as a whole, as well as locally. If Denver managers, and managers elsewhere, for that matter, would expend more energy and money in striving to still further improve the results upon their screens, instead of trying to give six reels of pictures and an ice cream cone for five cents, they would be the gainers in the long run. And, by the way, let me inform you that one house on Curtis Street is operating on a two for five cents basis. Think of it! It is a large beautiful house at that. I would humbly suggest to the manager of that theater that he include a glass of lemonade and possibly a cigar with each admission, or he might admit them by the dozen—say twelve admissions for 17 cents. Well, I am not the guardian of the Denver managers, thanks be, but it does seem that such a policy is far from being the best one, and I think the majority of Denver managers thoroughly agree with that view. Cut it out, gentlemen! Forget about the nickel admissions and make the Denver public pay what their entertainment is worth.

My sincere thanks to Denver local union No. 230 for their cordial and hearty welcome. That entertainment committee is one live and lively bunch, with an electric headlight in front and red fire on the back porch. If the editor got any sleep it was no fault of theirs. Their entertainment lasted clear to Exline, Iowa, when I threw the empty bot——. And let me say right here, in closing, that there will always be a warm spot in the heart of the editor for the operators of Portland, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Salt Lake City and Denver.

Lens Trouble.

Portland, Oregon, writes:

> I have for my own use an Optigraph machine head and a Baloptican stereopticon. With the M. P. head came a Pathe lens which I could get no image from. I removed the back combination and now get a six-foot picture at 25 feet. Can you explain why this should be?

Possibly the lenses in the back combination were one, or both of them, reversed. See figure 143 of the handbook. The heaviest bulge of all lenses should be toward the screen. It is possible that the lens is of such short focal length that you cannot get it back close enough to the film. You give the millimeter length, but I cannot make the figures out. An objective lens will work all right using only the front combination, but it gives a picture of greatly reduced size.

Advisability of Patenting.

Mr. A. W. Ballenger, one of the owners of the Dean Theatre, York, Nebraska, writes:

> Will you kindly publish your opinion as to the advisability of patenting a take-up-tension-equalizer—one that secures its tension from the film without putting any more strain on the film than the present take-up devices. I am sure of the practicability of the device, but hesitate to put money into a patent unless there is probability of a market for it. Would greatly appreciate your advice.

Brother Ballenger, it is utterly impossible to give an intelligent opinion without first having given the device a practical test under ordinary operating conditions. Broadly, however, it is doubtful if the patentee would reap sufficient reward to pay him for the labor, and trouble involved in securing a patent and manufacturing and marketing the article, particularly if it could not be successfully applied to all machines. Moreover, I happen to know that there has recently been patented a device which is perfectly simple, and which gives an absolutely even pull on the film throughout an entire run, from the empty spool to the full reel, but this device will only be used on one machine, and will not be out for some time yet. If your device is simple enough (not complicated, or hard to manufacture) and you can dispose of it to some machine manufacturer, well and good; otherwise I, personally, would hesitate about putting any money into it; in fact, I would not do it. Understand, however, this is only my own personal view. Use your own judgment.

Wears Too Fast.

Roanoke, Virginia, writes ordering a handbook, and says:

> My only trouble is that the driving gear for the idler (680 plate 5, page 280 of the handbook) of my Power's 6A wears faster than it ought to. You bet we raise a howl if the "Moving Picture World" does not come in on time.

The trouble you complain of is doubtless due to the fact that the gear is a little soft, but, after all, this gear does not cost much, and it is guaranteed for one year. As the projector is giving satisfaction otherwise, I do not think a trouble of this kind, while it may be annoying, is serious enough to do any very strenuous kicking about. Doubtless the next gear you put on will give you good service, as I have known of instances of Power's gears running for more than a year, eight hours a day without giving trouble, and this is as much as can reasonably be expected of any gear.

The Maker Relies on Your Intuition.

The Enterprising Optical Company, Chicago, have excelled all other manufacturers of moving picture mechanisms in the compilation of instructions for the operation of their various devices. However, excerpts from the following letter from Mr. J. S. Grimes, Leavenworth, Ind., show that there may yet be something to be desired, so far as their gas-making outfits are concerned. The criticisms of brother Grimes are timely, and if the instructions accompanying the gas outfit did not cover the points named, then they are inadequate. The man who receives a new piece of mechanism, concerning which he knows absolutely nothing, should be provided with instructions telling him exactly what to do first, what to do next and so on through every process in the operation of the device. If machinery was always placed in the hands of competent operators, who possessed full knowledge thereof, then such instructions would not be necessary, but, as a matter of fact, particularly in small towns, in a great many instances at least, moving picture apparatus is sold to men who have no previous experience therewith and are therefore unable to operate the same, unless very clear and concise directions are given covering every step of the operation thereof. Moreover, manufacturers know this is the case and, as I have repeatedly pointed out, it is up to them to provide the necessary information. I have had no personal experience with the Model B outfit for a long time, therefore I am forwarding Brother Grimes' letter to the Enterprise Optical Company with request that competent instructions be sent. These comments are not aimed especially at the Enterprise Company, but at manufacturers in general. I believe the Enterprise Company has a competent book of instructions for their Model B, and that someone has been careless in not sending the right pamphlet to neighbor Grimes. The letter reads as follows:

> Some time ago I purchased a second-hand Model B outfit in apparently first-class mechanical condition, and being unfamiliar with the theory connected with the manufacture of calcium gas, I addressed the Enterprise Optical Company at Chicago, requesting directions for operating the outfit. I am enclosing you the letter I received in reply, together with the direction sheet attached, as I received it from the company. Now, I have always had good luck with everything I ever attempted, from the electric arc to the acetylene outfit for motion picture projection, and I believe I could write directions which would enable any mechanic to operate either one without serious difficulty, but after reading the attached direction sheet, I knew less about it than I did immediately after I had finished overhauling it. What I want to know when starting to use anything new is where to begin, all the necessary precautions, etc., and where to stop. But all I could derive from the direction sheet was that the outfit was an appliance for the making of calcium gas from oxone and ether and that it was highly recommended for that purpose. By not knowing which needle to turn first I have had several explosions in my rubber connecting hose, splitting them along the sides. I had to go to sleep and dream for the hole where the ether was to be poured in; also I could not imagine whether the flame should hit the top, bottom or middle of the lime. If the illustration had not been unusually good, I would not have known how to connect the various openings and I might have opened the drain valve to start the gas to the burner, if I had not had former experience with this type of valves. Now I feel that there are others who use these outfits and have many troubles which could be prevented by a concise, but definite, sheet of directions. To this day, after a whole lot of experience with the outfit, I know but very little about operating it. I notice that a great deal of the time the light will burn with the "O" needle entirely closed and give what I believe are good results. I am using the 1913 Model Motiograph Machine, and it is giving me excellent results. The only trouble I have experienced in ten months' use is the top loop being unprotected from the upper sprocket. It seems, that as the tail piece comes from between the top sprocket and roller, it has a tendency to spring or flap over the upper sprocket which is revolving in the opposite direction from the direction of the film's travel, thus causing the teeth to catch in the film perforations and jerk backwards on the film. This is a very serious objection, especially when the exchange has not applied a tailpiece of blank film. Of course, every time this happens it damages the film and, as a repair, it is necessary to cut off the tail end of the film. I have tried shortening the loop at the top, but bad places in the film will cause this loop to lengthen while in motion, and then trouble starts. Twice this year the Ohio river has been six and ten feet in my theater, but I am going ahead and expect to open another house in a neighboring town this Fall.

From Cleveland.

Mr. D. R. Canady, Cleveland, Ohio, writes:

> Just a line to let you know that everything is going smoothly in the sixth city. Working conditions are getting better every day. I am chief operator for The Dreamland Amusement Company, at The Dreamland Theater. They also own a Bronx Theater. I have been with the company for two and a half years. Use two Motiograph machines in each theater and now just a word in regard to ozone generators. If any of the boys desire to install an ozone plant at small cost, I will be glad to give them details, etc., for the construction of the same, complete. I have had wide experience in high frequency apparatus, and am in a position to furnish information on this subject. This, I think, will be of interest to the small town exhibitor, since it will enable him to keep up to date at a small cost. As a side line, I am operating racing motor cycles. Hope to be able to call on you at your office about the middle of August.

If you intend to give this dope away, why not give it to the department, Brother Canady, and, by the way, next time sign your name so I won't have to do ten minutes studying to find out who is writing; am not sure I have it right even now. Will be glad to have you call when in New York.

More Lens Trouble.

Austin, Texas, comes across with the following:

> I have run across a little difficulty and I shall have to trouble the "Man Higher Up." We have just installed a new Power's 6A and with a 5-in. e. f. lens I am unable to focus properly at 105 feet. With the lens screwed farthest in (toward the film) the picture is still somewhat hazy. I removed the bushing and tapped the lens tube so as to fit the outer casing, and in this way am able to place the lens far enough inward to get a good picture. I am satisfied with the results I am getting, but don't like to run a machine with part of it in the tool box. Please advise me how to remedy this trouble. I noticed in last week's World that you will send a carbon of the reply to appear if a stamped envelope is enclosed with inquiry, and am enclosing one.

Your trouble, Texas, is due, I think, to the fact that you have one of the new style lens tubes, in which the front lens combination is set almost flush with the front end of the tube, and the back combination is inset quite a distance into the tube. I do not know the reason for this new scheme, but presume it is to prevent oil from splashing on the lens. In this respect it would probably prove effective, but it sets up the trouble which you have encountered. You did the only thing possible to do under the circumstances.

Up To Date.

Mr. Roy A. Goggin, Estherville, Iowa, orders a handbook and writes:

> I feel sorry for the boys who are obliged to operate machines four or five years old. Their managers must not be very enterprising, or very good showmen. My manager wants the best there is and he provides me with everything necessary to produce results. He is as good a fellow to work for as one could expect to find. We just recently installed a new motor drive Power's 6A, with all the latest attachments. We also have a Hallberg a. c. to d. c. economizer coming. Our show has a reputation all over this section of the country. State rights men have told me they have heard about our house in some of the farthest parts of the state. Sounds like blowing our own horn, doesn't it, but it is, nevertheless, a fact.

Here is a manager in a small town, or at least a comparatively small town, who evidently is a showman, and not afraid to back up his faith in the movies with the necessary expenditures for an up-to-date equipment to put them on right. That is the kind of manager who succeeds. I, too, neighbor Goggin, feel sorry for the boys compelled to operate projectors of ancient vintage. Friend Goggin says that he has seen a handbook and it is something every operator and manager should have.

On the Road.

Brother Max Hollander, better known as "Crab" Hollander, has hit the road with the Paul J. Rainey films. Brother Hollander is one of New York's popular ones. We wish him a successful trip.

Double Spot.

A. F. Redmond, manager Gem Theater, Severy, Kansas, propounds the following:

> I have always worked for a manager who did not believe there was such a word as "can't," but I am now running a house of my own and have the following difficulty, which, regardless of what any manager may think about "can't," I have not been able to remedy. Am operating a 1913 No. 1A Motiograph, using 110 volt, 133 cycle current through a Fort Wayne Compensarc. I find that my lower carbon burns considerably faster than the upper one; also there is a double spot on the cooling plate. I wrote the Enterprise Optical Co. and they sent me a copy of their general instruction book, with a few passages marked, but this don't seem to help any. I suppose you wonder how I am making both ends meet in a town of 800 population. Well, my wife plays the piano and I have a sister who sells tickets for me, so you see it is quite a family affair. Now, here is something which will be of interest to small town managers. I made an agreement with some of our merchants that with every $1.00 spent with them by out-of-town customers they would give one ticket to my theater. I provided the tickets, with the merchant's name printed on the back. As they come in I take them to the merchant whose name appears on the ticket, and he pays me half price for them. I now have them coming to my house from miles around, and am clearing, above expenses, from $5.00 to $10.00 a night.

Your ticket scheme, friend Redmond, is as simple as it is effective. You have not named the price of admission, but I presume it is ten cents, so that the merchants pay five cents for each ticket. Looks to me like a mighty good scheme all around. As to your light trouble, I am unable to understand why your lower carbon burns away faster than the upper; with a. c. there ought to be very little difference, but what there is should be exactly opposite to your condition. As to the double spot, I would suggest that you study carbon setting carefully, pages 204 to 212, inclusive, of the handbook. Try changing the angle of your lamp, giving it a little more, or a little less slope from the perpendicular. Also try changing the advancement of the upper and lower carbons. Sometimes the double spot is due to setting the lamp too nearly perpendicular, so that light from both craters reaches the condenser. The double spot proposition is a hard one. Be sure that your condensing lenses set square with each other.

Any of our readers who can help Severy in this matter are invited to do so, either through the department, or directly. Friend Redmond is doing a meritorious thing in providing a little community of 800 souls with a form of amusement, the same as is enjoyed by us right here in New York. Time and again I have pointed out the fact that these little towns would have no theatrical amusement whatever, but for the enterprise of such men as neighbor Redmond. I have also brought out the fact that these houses must, in the very nature of things, be a family affair. If they had to employ a pianist, ticket seller, operator, etc., they simply could not exist, and these small communities would, therefore, be deprived of all theatrical amusement. This department is perfectly willing to help the city man when it can, but particularly, especially, and primarily, it is for the small town manager and operator, who have practically no other means or opportunity for acquiring information and knowledge of projection and the things allied thereto.

A Few Questions.

Mr. Henry Tucker, Liberal, Kansas, asks the following questions:

> (a) Will extremely hot and dry weather have a tendency to make films more inflammable when run through a machine, provided they are not dampened in some manner? If so, will wrapping the reels in a damp cloth or placing them in a "soaking" vat alleviate this trouble? For the last three consecutive nights I have had the film ignite while running through the machine (Edison Model B), something I have never had happen before. One of the instances resulted in a reel being destroyed; the other two I managed to tear the burning ends off. As a rule, this is often caused by a piece of film breaking off behind the aperture plate; however, am quite certain that was not so in this case, as I watched for same very carefully.
> (b) What is the usual life of motor generator sets, say the two described in the handbook; if properly attended to and well taken care of?
> (c) Will the formula for a white curtain coating, given on page 338 of the handbook give good results on a roll curtain; if not, what will?

(a) While theoretically a moist film might not ignite so readily as a dry one, still I think in practice there would be no appreciable difference, except that dry film is much more brittle, and more apt to have pieces break off and stick in the gate. If your film ignited while the machine was running this must have been what happened, or you ran the machine at a very low speed indeed. Very likely the piece was a small one and you did not see it, even though you watched closely. I do not think moistening film would have any appreciable effect, except to lessen the liability of bits of film breaking off.

(b) With ordinary repairs the life of such a set, when properly cared for, is indefinite. Of course, the moving parts wear out, and in course of time, a pretty long time however, the insulation of the armature might become weakened sufficiently to require rewinding, but just on a guess, I should say that ought to occur in less than fifteen or twenty thousand hours of use. Commutators and bearings would require renewal, since they wear out through friction, but even if they are given proper care and lubrication they will last for a long time. The field magnets, frame, etc., should, to all intents and purposes, be indestructible. I think I am perfectly safe in saying that these sets, with ordinary care and ordinary repairs, should last not less than five years, running an average of eight hours a day, provided they be not over-loaded.

(c) The curtain paint formula on page 338 will work all right on a roll curtain, but a canvas should be first well sized with a size made of good flexible glue (fish glue).

The Crowded Hour.

Tulsa, Oklahoma, orders one of the Hand Books and speaks thusly:

> Projection in this town is very poor, but it is not the fault of the operators. The managers require the running of from four to six reels in an hour, and into that hour is also crowded anywhere from one to four vaudeville acts. There is, however, one show where the pictures are run right. This house only uses three reels, and they are put on properly. All the theaters are well ventilated and they the all well patronized. Would you advise me where I can get a receipt for cleaning film; also book on calcium gas? What kind of gas outfit would you recommend for traveling? Could I get an adjustable lens that would give a picture from nine feet to about twice that size at a distance of thirty-five feet and use the same for a sixty-foot projection?

It is hardly worth while commenting on the utter foolishness of managers who undertake to run from four to six reels an hour, and include in that hour from one to four vaudeville acts. This department has time, and time again called attention to the utter asininity of such proceedings. I would not advise you to try any film cleaning compound. If you do you are more than likely to have a bunch of refractory film on your hand. You can clean film with alcohol, but the film will curl so badly that it will be well nigh impossible to handle it. As to the lens, there is one adjustable lens which gives fairly good results, though I do not at this moment remember its name. I do not think you could use it successfully on that width of range, however. I would recommend that you use a lens jacket and get an assortment of tubes. I cannot recommend any one make of device in this department.

A Matter of Distance.

Mr. Phil Chakers, manager Princess Theater, Springfield, Ohio, orders one of the handbooks, and asks:

> In our new theater, now in the course of erection, we want a twenty-four foot picture. The distance from screen to lens is 160 feet. Please advise us as to whether or not this is too great a distance for projection.

If you are going to project a twenty-four foot picture, I think 160 feet will not prove excessive, since that will only require about a 6¼ inch lens. On the other hand, should you reduce this picture to say less than twenty feet, then 160 feet would require a very long focal length objective lens and a somewhat shorter throw would, I think, prove more desirable. Let me suggest to you that, on the whole, taking everything into consideration, I believe a twenty-foot picture would meet every requirement as to size, and give you much better general results. For a twenty-foot picture at 160 feet I would use a half size objective lens, and stop it down to about ¾ of an inch diameter by means of a cardboard diaphragm placed inside the front end of the tube, against the front lens. I believe there would be considerable advantage in this scheme, and I am not sure but what I would use an even smaller opening than this in the diaphragm. Some advocate the placing of the diaphragm inside the tube, half way between the two lenses, but I think placing it as directed serves precisely the same purpose, and I am even inclined to think it serves it somewhat better. To project a twenty-foot picture at 160 feet would take a 7½ e. f. lens. I think that you would have no trouble in projecting a twenty-foot picture at 160 feet, using a half size lens, stopped down as directed, and with a proper combination of condensers. While it is something of a guess on my part, I believe a 7½ condenser next to the light and an 8½ in front would work all right, but it is possible you might have to put an extension on your machine table so as to get the lamphouse further back. But if you project 160 feet, you must make sure there is no vibration in your projector, since every bit of movement in the machine itself will be magnified to a much greater extent in a long throw than in a short one.

A Traveling Show.

Mr. Harry Bowman, Jr., writes from Kannapolis, North Carolina:

> I am operator with a small tent show owned by my father. We seat about 400 people and play North and South Carolina; we are now about to venture into Virginia. In addition to operating I also work vaudeville, as persons traveling with a small tent show must be jacks of all trades. Father and I are old hands at the business. He had one of the first Lubin machines, and believe me, it was a crude affair; that was fifteen years ago. For traveling purposes, I stand by the Edison first, last and all the time. We use gas tanks and on the recommendation of friend Russell, of British Columbia, we bought a Guil Pastil; it is great. The light is almost equal to an arc, and is easy on the eyes. I paid but slight attention to the gas consumed, but think it uses less than the limes. The only possible objection is that they are fragile and chip very easily. I hardly think one Pastil will last as long as a can of limes, but it is more satisfactory. I have been using gas for six years and the Pastil beats limes by a mile.

All reports to date indicate that the advent of the Guil Pastil marks a big advancement in gas projection, and the gentleman who first imported them, and reported them to the department (I cannot recall his name at the moment) is deserving the sincere thanks of all gas users.

Thanks to the West.

I wish to take this opportunity to extend to all those unions and individuals, who did so much to make my trip pleasant, my most cordial and sincere thanks. I also wish to thank Brothers Dolliver and Boyle for what they did in the Convention, and to express my appreciation to all those delegates who voted for, and with me. It would take too much space to mention individuals, since there were literally hundreds of them, who contributed to the pleasure of my trip. I trust some day to have the pleasure of meeting them again. Meanwhile, they may feel assured that their kindness will not be forgotten.

An Advertisement.

Mr. W. A. Clay, owner of the "It" Theater, Ogden, Utah, writes as follows:

> For heaven's sake avail yourself of the enclosed $2.50, and send us a handbook. The Department has devoted much space to the advertising of that book for a year. One is obliged to believe that an operator cannot keep house without it.

Yes, Brother Clay, and it is going to advertise it some more, too. You may believe that this is done solely from the viewpoint of money making, but you are in error there. My desire to have these books in the hands of operators was so strong that, although I was entitled, by agreement, to a royalty of 25 cents on each copy of the first edition, I waived that right in order to keep the price down and get the books circulated as widely as possible. This cost me a good many hundred dollars. I am entirely satisfied if it accomplished its purpose, and I think it did. If you think I am doing this on account of the royalty received your are, as I before said, in error.

Operators have not been accustomed to spending any portion of their salaries to improve themselves. It is a hard job to get some of them to see the light on that particular proposition. I publish a great many, though comparatively a very small proportion, of the orders received. Out of the thousands of these books sold there has not been a single dissatisfied purchaser, while on the other hand many enthusiastic letters of commendation have been received, and I think your own will probably be added to the list.

I will also ask you to bear in mind the fact that for some years there was no published work of any size or consequence in existence that pertained exclusively to motion picture projection. I compiled the first edition of the handbook because I couldn't buy one myself. Such a book was needed and it was up to somebody to write one, so I sat down and wrote it; that's all there is to that. When the first edition was getting low I sat down and wrote a bigger one. There is nothing in the world to stop anyone else from sitting down and "dashing off" a handbook, but they don't do it. If any critic of the handbook will walk into this office with the manuscript of such a book that is superior to the one I have compiled, The Motion Picture World will be glad to publish it and I will be glad to have it so. I've been through the mill and I know the work that is connected with it.

An Old Timer.

Mr. W. D. Sullings, New Decatur, Alabama, sends in the following line of conversation:

> Enclosed find $2.50 for handbook. Guess this is the first time you have heard from this part of the country, though we are very much alive and look for the "World" every week; always get good dope from it. New Decatur has three picture houses, and I think projection is about as good as anywhere in the country; at least that is the verdict of the traveling public. I am chief operator at the Delite. Operating room is 8x10x7, equipped with one Power's 6 and one Edison type B; using 110 volts through two Fort Wayne compensarcs. What do you think of a union operator who tries to get a job from a non-union house in another town, where the manager is paying good salaries, and who offers to work for any old price? A man of that calibre from Birmingham tried that here last week, and yet they say the union is a good thing. I have been operating since the days of 50-foot films (1897), but I do not profess to know it all by any means, and am sending for a handbook to improve my knowledge.

No organization can be condemned as a whole for the act of one member. You would not condemn the whole United States Government because one senator proves to be crooked, nor do you condemn the whole church because one member turns out to be a skunk. Glad to know projection is good. You are proving yourself to be a wise man by acknowledging the fact that none of us know so much that we cannot improve in knowledge, and by the further fact, that you are willing to invest a small portion of your income to that end.

Something Wrong.

Mr. W. L. Crawford, of Crawford & Crawford, owners of the Riverside Theater, Cascade, Iowa, propounds the following:

> We have not in the past availed ourselves of the use of the columns of the Projection Department, but will thank you very much if you will reply through the department, or open the matter for discussion as outlined below: We are using 110 volts alternating through a Fort Wayne compensarc on the 20 contact. Have tried ½-inch, ⅝-inch and ¾-inch soft cord Electra and Bio carbons; cleaned, polished and tightened every contact or binding post, and yet we cannot discover why carbons should act as they do—penciling very much and for a distance of ½ to 1¼ inches down the carbon towards the holder, being completely worthless after one burn—that is, they are entirely disintegrated, as it were, being merely a mass of dust that brushes off at a touch. It cannot be lamphouse ventilation, as we run with the back slide removed. We use the trim as set forth in the handbook, a copy of which is always on hand. Have used our compensarc for six months, and it is now beginning to sing very much. Is it probable that it is breaking down? Hardly that, for we use only the 20 contact, and at that it delivers considerable heat, at times being too hot to touch with the bare hand.

The penciling of your carbons might be due to poor contact, which causes undue heating of the carbons, but it hardly seems likely that the condition described would be brought about when using the lowest contact of the compensarc. If the compensarc heats as described, under the conditions named, then there undoubtedly is something radically wrong. Possibly the connections are not properly made and what is supposed to be the lowest contact is really the highest. I suggest this as possible, though it is highly improbable. In any event, if your description is correct, there is something wrong, and you had better use resistence temporarily and ship the compensarc back to the factory for examination and repairs, which will, of course, be up to the factory to make without cost. As to the singing of the compensarc, be sure that it does not set near any sheet metal—say within 18 inches to 2 feet of it. Clean out your carbon contacts thoroughly, and see if that helps the penciling.

A Further Reply.

Recently the Cascade Amusement Company, Tientsin, China, asked for certain information concerning a G. E. Mercury Arc Rectifier. I referred their letter to the General Electric Company, but their reply was not ample enough, and I asked them for further information, which has been received, as follows:

> From the letter Mr. Gyer, of the Cascade Amusement Company, writes, I am led to believe that the trouble with this rectifier is in the relay, which very likely has a loose collar, and if the contacts remain closed might heat up and burn out the starting resistance and shaking magnet. Tubes should be examined at intervals of two or three weeks for vacuum, and the mercury should be caused to roll from the cathode into the condensing chamber, and the sound noted. If there is a sharp metallic click it indicates a good vacuum in the tube, but, if on the contrary, the mercury is sluggish, and the sound is dead, the vacuum is poor or entirely gone. The starting resistance should be noticed at times while operating to see if it heats excessively. The shaking magnet should also be noted while operating to see that it does not become too hot. The relay should be noted particularly to see that contact is broken as soon as the tube starts. If the contact is not broken then the shaking magnet is constantly in circuit, which I believe Mr. Gyer will find to be his trouble. He can very easily tighten the collar on the relay to eliminate this difficulty. I should say that the parts of the rectifier above mentioned are about the only ones that could possibly get out of order, and if due attention is paid to these parts, as above indicated, the rectifier should give no trouble. Referring to the last half of the third paragraph of Mr. Gyer's letter in which he states that he might have been using 33 amperes instead of 30, I would say, that while we do not guarantee a rectifier to carry any overload, an excess of 3 amperes should not cause any trouble. I would suggest that operators keep their carbons well apart while operating, as the starting load on a rectifier at times is quite heavy.

The General Electric will kindly accept our thanks for the information given. I would suggest, however, that in operating, the opening of the carbons is arbitrarily governed by the distance at which the best light is secured. I would say further, that any overload has a tendency to shorten the life of the tube, though a slight overload, 3 amperes for instance, ought not to affect any other part of the rectifier.

A Suggestion to Mr. Bilodean.

Mr. F. H. Geer, Upland, California, submits the following:

> In July 12th issue Mr. Bilodean complains of a pull or binding during a part of each revolution of the crank, shortly after having installed new gears. If this binding consists of the wobbly feeling and grinding accompanied by a very rapid jumping of the picture, he may find that the bevel gear either on the crank shaft, or more likely on the ¼-inch shaft, is loose on its spindle. In this connection I would like to inquire if others are experiencing trouble with the bevel gear on the Edison outside shutter on Model B working loose. I am putting in another pin slightly ahead of, and at right angles to, the old one.

Comment on this is not necessary, but Brother Geer is thanked for his suggestions.

Poor Contact.

Mr. Merritt Jones, Decatur, Alabama, says he found that his Fort Wayne compensarc was not giving satisfactory light. He examined it and found that his switch at the top was gummed up with carbon dust and greases. He sand-papered the contact and found the light to be greatly improved, all of which merely shows that in order to get the current you must keep your contacts clean and in good order, as I have repeatedly set forth in this department. He also suggests that when a stereopticon lens projects too large a picture, the picture may be reduced by removing the back combination of the lens, which is correct, but the reduction in the size of the picture would be pretty heavy.

"THE COAST GUARD'S SISTER" (Edison), August 15.—This picture is one of Edison's English series and the charming backgrounds therein show the wisdom of sending players to that picturesque country. The story concerns a young sailorman who joins the smugglers to get a diamond ring for the girl he loves, who happens to be the coast guard's sister. They finally decide that the best way is for him to buy her a diamond engagement ring. The action is confusing in some parts over the identities of the two girls. Dark photography obscures some of the scenes and the scenes are the best part of the picture. The thread of the story is lost several times.

"OVER A CRIB" (Lubin), August 15.—A story about a bachelor who adopts a little girl and is then obliged to hire a nurse to look after her. The nurse is very charming and the bachelor marries her. Later the parents of the child come and take her away, but not before certain definite signals are shown that there is another youngster due to arrive. It is the usual signal; a baby's shirt, a knitting basket, etc. This picture has the usual trouble of most photoplays, a bad start, mostly caused by cutting down scenes to get the picture in 1,000 feet. This one looks as though it were cut down from 1,500 feet. Consequently jerky.

"THE COSMOPOLITAN LIFE OF CAIRO" (Patheplay), August 15.—A series of interesting scenes of natives performing for tourists, including a regular hoochy-koochy dance that must have looked good to the censors.

"ON THE LAKES OF BAYRISCH, BAVARIA" (Patheplay), August 15.—On the same reel with the above. A nicely colored scenic of the Bavarian lakes and Alps. Photography dark.

"PICTURESQUE JURA, FRANCE" (Patheplay), August 15.—On the same reel with the above. Ordinary scenery not very clear in photography.

"THE MILLIONAIRE AND THE GOOSE" (Kalem), August 15.—Bill stuffs his goose with corn, mixed with particles of gold, and sells it to the hotel. He gets $50,000 for his land when the news gets out and then leaves town quickly. Good comedy, well acted and photographed.

"THE AMATEUR BURGLAR" (Kalem), August 15.—On the same reel with the above. There is a burglar scare and Brown gets a friend to play burglar to scare his wife. The real burglar gets there first and beats up Brown. The amateur cracksman comes later and the wife beats him up. Fairly amusing but not strong.

"BROWN'S NEW MONETARY STANDARD" (Selig), August 15.—A yarn about a theorist who gets the idea that gold is going to depreciate to a lower standard than copper and converts all his money into pennies. The difficulties he encounters in paying for things in coppers furnishes the basis of the comedy, if the picture can be said to contain any comedy, which is doubtful.

"THE LADY AND THE GLOVE" (Vitagraph), August 15.—A series of overcrowded scenes due to a too close foreground line. A costume play based on an old legendary poem that tells of a lady fair who dropped her glove into an arena of lions to prove the love of a gallant knight. He descends into the arena, gets the glove, and returning throws it in the lady's face and spurns her. The picture takes a long time in getting down to business. It takes half the reel to establish the fact that two women love the same man. There is a big audience around an arena containing lions, but it is not clear what the occasion is. The audience might rather have enjoyed more scenes of lions in action than so many scenes of love and jealousy.

"ALKALI IKE'S GAL" (Essanay), August 15.—A two reel comedy is quite an undertaking and the Essanay has succeeded well in this one. Now and then it runs a little to the improbable, but in the main it is good, legitimate comedy, well acted and photographed.

"THE COAST OF CHANCE" (Selig), August 13.—In the real sense of the word, there is no story, none that is coherent and intelligible, in this picture. A faint, misty outline may now and then be discerned as when one approaches a coast from out at sea just at sunset. These players—Margaret Prussing, Harriet Notter, Charles Clary, Thomas Carrigan, with the others,—deserve a better medium for their talent. There are some very well chosen and beautiful scenes and backgrounds pretty well photographed.

"THE FLIRT" (Vitagraph), August 13.—This picture has already been reviewed in THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. See page 514, August 2, 1913.

"THE ERRING BROTHER" (Patheplay), August 13.—The girl chooses the younger brother, who is a very hard drinker. The older brother loves her and does all he can for the younger man; but is unable to avert a tragedy. The offering makes very fair entertainment; for it has fine backgrounds, typical of the western country in which it is set, and the story is clearly set forth and made plausible. There are some fine views of a big herd of sheep and one or two of a monster herd of cattle.

"THE SKELETON IN THE CLOSET" (Kalem), August 13.—A two-part offering with a story of early western life. It fails of being strong; because the skeleton in the closet is not real and there is no reason why the heroine should act as though there was anything to fear at all. Her father had been a horse thief. She had run away and, later, had married a sheriff. One of her father's gang comes and blackmails her with a threat to tell the sheriff. The exhibitor can judge for himself. The opening scenes have good action and strongly awaken suspense—they are fine in their promise; but the climax fails to fulfill it. All through both reels the players give many excellent things and come near making the picture commendable. The photography is clear but uneven.

"GOOD NIGHT NURSE" (Essanay), August 13.—A sanitarium flirtation is pictured in this offering; but we have seen others that were not unlike it in situation and dare not commend it as being better than fair. The author can hardly take much credit. Billy Mason, a rich youth with auto troubles in the neighborhood of a sanitarium, sees Beverly Bayne, thinks she is an inmate, and applies for treatment as a patient. Some of the photography is commendable; but those scenes taken from above downward and vice versa are not especially creditable.

"UP LOOKOUT MOUNTAIN ON THE ELECTRICAL INCLINE" (Essanay), August 13.—On the same reel is this scenic, interesting in its subject and very fairly photographed.

"BATTLE FIELDS AROUND CHATTANOOGA" (Edison), August 13.—What scenic could be more interesting and instructive than a good picture of a great battle field. In such a picture, clear panoramas are better than mere glimpses of monuments which to the average spectator mean very little. There are some good general views in this offering, but many statues. The quality of the photography is only fair.

"THE RIGHT NUMBER BUT THE WRONG HOUSE" (Edison), August 13.—It is sure that this comedy failed to get over to many in the audience with us. It cannot convince anyone who thinks quickly. It would be a strange world in which its situations, as they develop, could be even possible.

"KEEPING HUSBANDS HOME" (Vitagraph), August 14.—A risque offering. We recommend exhibitors to go slow if their audiences are particular.

"COME SEBEN LEBEN" (Biograph), August 14.—A picture of social life in Coonville. It is set mostly in the gambling place of a crap shooter and in the home of Rastus and his wife. The fun turns on a pair of loaded dice. In the print we saw, it was left obscure how Rastus got the pair that was right for him and wrong for the gambler. He was sharp enough to get them somehow; but he couldn't keep them. There is a good deal of fun in it; small darkey things that are laughable, as well as the main joke which, in other prints may be clearer, though we, the reviewer, have no right to expect it. The photography is pretty good.

"PAPA'S BABY" (Biograph), August 14.—Comic nonsence and laughable monkey shines. The two on this reel will entertain and lighten a program.

"AN APACHE'S GRATITUDE" (Selig), August 14.—This was the most popular offering among regular releases today. The story is more or less conventional; but has been ably produced by William Duncan and his company and is plausible, interesting and wholesome. It is set in backgrounds that are full of atmosphere of the wild West and is clearly photographed. Tom Mix plays the Apache who is helped by William Duncan (author, producer and hero). Jim Robson plays the villain and Myrtle Stedman the girl. Rex de Rosselli also has a role.

"THE WORLD ABOVE" (Essanay), August 14.—The idle rich man (Richard Travers) and his wife (Lillian Drew) live up stairs in "the world above" and the janitor's daughter (Ruth Stonehouse) is captivated by their beautiful apartment and "heavenly life." Her lover (E. H. Calvert) is a telephone lineman. Ruth is in the habit of slipping up to the apartment when the people are out and has even, in his wife's absence, talked with the man who lives in it. One day her lover is up a nearby pole and sees her in trouble; she has been caught in the apartment by the rich man, who is drunk. The players are acceptable and the photography is clear; but the plot is rather weak.

"THE ROBBER OF ANGKOR" (Melies), August 14.—The acting of the Cambodian players in this picture, especially of those who took part in the attack of the robber band on the rich Cambodian merchant and his wife, is not effective to Americans and caused merriment. There is a white hero, and the native merchant's wife is made the heroine. In the backgrounds there is a great deal to commend as instructive; but the story is unusually weak and uninteresting. It seems too bad to waste those glorious backgrounds on such a tale. The photography is clear enough.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 41" (August 14).—Some items of news interest. A first class offering.

"THE HOUSE DIVIDED" (Patheplay), August 14.—A tragedy of Mexico in revolutionary times. It has been very prettily staged and there is much to commend in the acting of all the cast. Good photography and skillfully contrived lighting have made of some of the scenes very pleasing pictures. The story has a rather conventional plot along the line of exaggerated melodrama. It will find a following.

"GOOD FOR EVIL" (Lubin), August 14.—A two-part special that seemed very acceptable to a large audience; there was applause in the gallery. It is a devout picture, dealing with the sanctuary to criminals that the Church in some places accords. Its object is to show the spirit of good in life as overcoming evil. It takes for its hero a man very much in love wih a girl not worth loving, and for its villain the man's friend—he supplants him in the girl's affections. There is atmosphere in the portrayal by Romaine Fielding of the hero who becomes a monk; but very little in any of the other characters. The offering is effective in "getting across" and impresses one as sincere in its religious feeling. The backgrounds are well chosen and, for the most part, beautifully photographed. Romaine Fielding plays the hero; Burton King, the villain, and Adele Lane, the girl. It was written by Wilbert Melville.

"MARY'S TEMPTATION" (Lubin), August 18.—This picture, the script for which was written by Shannon Fife and produced by Barry O'Neil, will make a fair release. It has no big situations; neither is there in it anything essentially new in the way of a plot, but it is well produced.

"THE SUBSTITUTE ENGINEER" (Kalem), August 18.—This railroad story is notable chiefly for its attempt to portray in considerable detail the work of a train dispatcher. Undoubtedly it will have more interest for railroad men than for others. The development lags, although at the end there is a good situation built up.

"SLIM DRISCOLL, SAMARITAN" (Vitagraph), August 18.—Mr. Holt in the title role of this burglar story does good work. Director Bauman has produced an interesting picture, made so in no small measure by the quality of the acting. There is a child in the picture—and what little she had to do was well done—whose name is given as Maxine Elliott.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY," August 18.—Some of the best stuff in an interesting number includes a review of the visit of the Secretary of the Interior to Glacier Park; a celebration in Oklahoma in which white and red men participate; the landing of the aviator who covered without stopping 287 miles, thereby breaking a record. The recent impeachment proceedings in the Legislature at Albany are responsible for bringing out a picture of Mr. Sulzer, taken at a time when there was no cloud on his title as Governor.

"STARVED OUT" (Edison), August 18.—A story written around a houseboat. There are many men and many girls; some of the latter are described as water nymphs, but their work in the water hardly justifies the use of the term. What was obviously intended as comedy did not so impress the reviewer; certainly in a good-sized morning house there was no audible evidence of mirth.

"THE CHILD OF THE SEA" (Selig), August 18.—There is in this two-reel picture good material for a single-part play. The action seems slow; the story in the first half does not bite. Kathlyn Williams has the lead. There are fine views of the waves breaking over rocks. While it seems improbable yet it is not impossible that a lighthouse keeper's dwelling should be separated from his light by a stretch of water. There are effective close views of a revolving light in action; but the distance views are of a stationary lamp. Al. Filson carries well the role of the father of the child picked up on the shore and adopted by the lightkeeper.

"NAPOLEON WHIFFLES, ESQ." (Patheplay), August 19.—Good comedy. The picture, the work of the Paris studio, is excellently put on. Mr. Whiffles has a sweetheart, Mme. Bonafait, who has the Napoleonic hobby. Whiffles smashes a bust while visiting his intended, but shortly afterward receives word that his uncle has left him a legacy of a bust of the Little Corporal. Delighted, Whiffles dreams he is Napoleon, his valet is an Oriental servant; he interviews three of his marshals and reviews the Old Guard; the sweetheart becomes the Empress and has her Ladies of the Court. There is a fine bit of absurdity when "Boni" and his marshals go to call on the Empress in an automobile. The keener the house the stronger will this comedy go.

"THE WHIP HAND" (Essanay), August 19.—It is good to see Frank Bushman on the screen again, even though the story in which he appears is not particularly strong. There are incidents in the picture which do not convince—for instance, where on horseback he overtakes an automobile containing his sweetheart and her wealthy admirer, and with no weapon more potent than a whip compels an immediate marriage of the two. The lash, nevertheless, furnishes a welcome relief from the overworked pistol. Juanita Dalmorez plays opposite to Mr. Bushman. The wealthy admirer is portrayed by Frank Dayton, who as the husband of three years is killed by the foolish action of the wife in toying with the apparatus controlling a dynamite blast in a quarry. There was nothing in the picture, by the way, to show that the husband was in any mann unworthy or deserving of the fate which the script writer imposed upon him. The work of the cast will put the picture over.

"BLACK BEAUTY" (Lubin), August 19.—A conventional story of a sheriff in love with a station agent, who gets a message not to stop a certain train because there is gold on board. The message is read by a bandit, who looks in the window and gleans its contents even though it is upside down. The girl is surprised later on by a hand and tied. With a whistle she summons Black Beauty, a horse which she owns The horse comes to her aid, and sets the signal clear just in time to permit the train to go ahead and foil the outlaws. In the few seconds involved in the train passing the station the girl frees herself of the restraining bonds, pets the horse, saddles and bridles him, leads him out of the building, mounts him and rides down the track just as the last car clears. The situation is impossible; it is absurd. The horse, a thoroughbred, is most interesting; the photography is excellent.

"TOBIAS TURNS THE TABLES" (Selig), August 19.—This military comedy, written by Arthur Hankins and produced by Oscar Eagle, will make fun. Charles Clary well plays the raw recruit who bungles in his drill and is detailed to breaking coal and later is sent to the guard house. His arrest of the colonel's wife for an infringement of a reservation regulation will furnish hearty amusement. Frank Wood plays the colonel, Rose Evans the wife and Alma Russell the maid. All are good.

"FLOOD TIDE" (Edison), August 19.—A picture in which appears Marc MacDermott, supported by Miriam Nesbitt, and with the rugged coast of Cornwall for a setting is bound to interest. While the outdoor photography is not of the clearest, this will be lost sight of in the backgrounds of cliff and surf.

"THOSE TROUBLESOME TRESSES" (Vitagraph), August 19.—Good comedy. The cast is John Bunny and Flora Finch, Wallie Van and Lillian Walker. The women, in order to convince their husbands that men are more jealous than women, put up a job on the poor men, but the latter overhear them and make a counter-move, which is most successful.

"THE IRON TRAIL" (Bison), August 19.—Action is the keynote of this Western offering. The scenes are all connected with early railroad building. There is trouble with the Indians from the very beginning. The first reel is given up to a series of haphazard happenings, briskly portrayed. In the second reel some genuine thrills are presented. The escape from redskins on the moving train was particularly exciting and, as a whole, the offering is a very creditable one.

"THE SMUGGLER'S SISTER" (Reliance), August 18.—The leading scene in this is the one in the hay barn, where a pipe full of live coals sets fire to the place, with the hero and the girl's brother tied in the mow. Alan Hale, Vivian Prescott and George Siegmann have the leads in this conventional smuggling story, and they handle the important parts so well that the interest is nicely sustained.

"COUNSEL FOR THE DEFENSE" (Reliance), August 20.—A new and well-pictured version of the cabaret story, in which the son of a wealthy man marries a singer in a restaurant. Rosemary Thebe plays the girl in question and is very attractive in the part. Later she stabs her husband. Her father-in-law defends her, without apparently knowing that his son was the victim, a weak spot in the plot. Later he takes the girl and her baby into his home. A story that will be watched with interest.

"THE REINCARNATION OF A SOUL" (Powers), August 29.—A semi-physical picture giving us the adventures of a body with first one soul and then another. It opens with a series of tableaus which begin by showing a baby who has just arrived in earthy being with a soul destined to be a thief (he is shown later as a kleptomaniac). Edwin August plays this weak character, in its story of struggle with suffering for a strange yet criminal tendency. In this, there are some good scenes, strongly acted; but the story isn't very successful; it won't be believed. The ending of the man by a stroke of lightning makes a sensational incident and then we find the body coming out of its death trance with a soul of a great painter, dead some two hundred years, and of course this isn't believable. Yet there is a peculiar fascination in the offering; the players and the photography make it seem at moments weird. A fair offering with strong pictures on the bill.

"THE PASSING OF BAD HUTCHINS" (Nestor), August 27.—Good scenic effects are the best feature of this Western drama. The young outlaw has a change of heart and saves the child of the woman he loved from bandits. The close of the picture, where the sheriff shoots him by mistake, is dramatic.

"THE BETTER FATHER" (Eclair), August 27.—A story of a father, wrongly mistrusting his wife, who hires a burglar to take away an infant. The thief in turn passes the child on to another, who cares for it until it is six years old, when through a death-bed revelation of the crook the child is restored to its parents. The two reels will interest. One of the features of the picture is a struggle on the roof of a Jersey City building, with the Hudson River and the tallest buildings of New York City for a back-ground. While the child who plays so important a role is a most delightful character, it must be admitted she should not have been cast as a boy; a girl playing a boy's part does not further the illusion, especially when the child is so essentially feminine. The picture has a happy ending.

"THE CALL" (Rex), August 31.—A story by Lois Weber and produced by Phillips Smalley. The plot has to do with the simple affairs of simple folk. While it is hardly up to the Smalleys' standard of sustained interest it easily goes over.

"WHAT GIRLS WILL DO" (Gem), August 25.—Glen White appears here as the one man at a bathing resort, and is of course decidedly popular with the bevy of pretty girls he finds there. Good photography and a fairly clever plot combine to make this a pleasing comedy offering.

"MYSTERY OF THE YELLOW ASTER MINE" (Bison), August 26.—A two-reel western picture with some charming glimpses of mountain scenery. It hinges upon the erroneous execution of an innocent Indian, which brings on a war between the whites and redskins. For anyone who likes plenty of riding and shooting, this picture should be all that could be desired. The half breed is present in his usual role.

"THE EYES OF THE GOD OF FRIENDSHIP" (Frontier), August 23.—A melodrama in which the first half is obscure; but the second half clear, effective and sufficiently plausible. It is a Pueblo God of Friendship three chums dig up out of the dust of a ruin in New Mexico. It has three rubies and each takes one as a memento and pledge of friendship. A villain enters the story, kills, in some way, one of the friends and escapes with his ruby. Later, he makes love to and is accepted by the sister of the murdered man; but, not knowing who she is, gives her the ruby which she has never seen and doesn't recognize. It is the means, however, of bringing the evil man to justice. The players are acceptable, at least in the second half, and the photography is clear, though a bit misty.

"THIRTEEN AT TABLE" (Eclair), August 24.—A farce burlesque which is very amusingly acted especially by the player who took the role of poet who is invited in to dinner when there is to be thirteen at table. He is not an honored guest and the hostess blows, now hot, now cold, according as the chance of ill luck seems to threaten or not. The poet is a Hamlet kind of man and we know well that he would have starved rather than eat as in the last act. The offering is commendable as a fun maker.

"SEA WORMS" (Eclair), August 24.—On the same reel is this natural history offering which is worthy and instructive.

"HOUSE HUNTING" (Majestic), August 17.—This story is slow in development, but the final scenes are stirring enough to make it a memorable release. The young real estate agent, William Garwood, arrives at the home of his sweetheart just in time to save her from three ruffians. The hand to hand encounter was vigorous and exciting.

"ARTILLERY PRACTICE AT MONTAUK POINT" (Majestic), August 17.—On same reel with above. Just a glimpse of big guns in action.

"THE MADCAP" (Broncho), August 27.—This story, beginning just before the Civil War, gets a very good start in the first reel, but falls off in interest later and the end is incomplete. The scenes leading up to Ethel's departure for the university were natural and entertaining. The pranks at the college were also enjoyable. The interest falls when John refuses to acknowledge her as his wife, and later, though she forgives him and helps him to escape from the enemy's fire, the story does not quite regain the interest it has lost. The brief war scenes were well handled and worked into the plot nicely.

"THE FIREBUGS" (Keystone), August 21.—A two-reel number in which Cohen hires two rival firebugs to burn out his clothing business. The characterizations are fair, but the humor of the piece is not very strong. One of the firebugs starts the fire, but his competitor puts it out and when Cohen goes to collect, he finds no actual damage has been done, so he gets no insurance. The chief merit of the picture is perhaps in the fact that it exposes, in burlesque fashion, the manner in which some fires are brought about.

"THE GREEN SHADOW" (Kay-Bee), August 29.—This two-reel offering is a strong "come back" in the way of Indian fighting. The battle with the savages in the second reel is picturesque in the extreme and will make even veteran picturegoers sit up. The story also is a strong one. The colonel's wife becomes jealous of her own sister, through an odd but plausible situation. The girl, discovering this, marries her sweetheart and leaves the fort. She is captured by Indians and the hero saves her in a desperate encounter, during which he kills numerous redskins. A strong offering of the kind.

"THE FOLLY OF IT ALL" (Powers), August 29.—A film story in which Edwin August plays the part of a minister. He absents himself mysteriously to look after a new home he is having built. His wife and friends plan a flirtation to bring his attention back home. He discovers them kissing just at a time when thieves are entering the house. The following scenes are a mixture of sensation and melodrama. The plot, while interesting, seemed to lack consistency toward the close.

"THE RUNAWAY UNCLE" (Eclair), August 31.—A rather amusing farce comedy, in which three Sherlock Holmes detectives trail Uncle William, who has run away and married. They discover him at the reception. The plot is eccentric rather than funny.

"HY MAYER'S CARTOONS" (Imp), August 30.—Some unusually funny drawings from Mr. Mayer's pen, with a good laugh in each one.

"BINKS ADVERTISES FOR A WIFE" (Imp), August 30.—On same reel with above. Binks is lured to the city by a chorus lady, who turns out to have a husband already. Some amusement in the fore part of this, but the plot is not of an elevating type.

"THE RED HEART" (Crystal), August 31.—A full reel drama, in which the situations are entertaining rather than stirring. The operations of the Italian gang are amusing rather than exciting. Good photography helps the story along wonderfully.

"HIS MOTHER'S SONG" (Imp), August 28.—The son, in a city cafe, hears an Italian organ grinder play "Love's Old Sweet Song." It takes his thoughts back to his mother and he returns to the old home, where he finds her ill from his neglect. In a series of abrupt flashes, he receives her forgiveness, marries his country sweetheart, and later is seen as a happy father. W. E. Shay and Jane Fearnley play the sweethearts and Ricca Allen the mother. A good offering of this type.

"THE STOLEN LOVE" (Imp), August 25.—A two-reel offering, written by Jack Byrne. It tells a broad, strongly developed story, which suffers only from the photography, which is not clear in places. Violet Mesereau is appealing in the part of the girl, her expressive countenance depicting her varying shades of thought very clearly. She is lured to the city by her lover's cousin, Arthur. Pete follows and there is a fine bit of drama enacted by the three principals in the scene where Pete learns the truth. The latter part of the story again takes up the narrative after a lapse of years and shows how the original lovers were brought together.

"AN UNROMANTIC MAIDEN" (Thanhouser), August 24.—Another good summer story, with a light, pleasing plot. The Count De Chromo wants to marry the girl, who insists upon reading her book all the time. Finally, in order to get rid of him, the girl drops her pocketbook in the boat behind the yacht and sends him for it. When he is in the boat, she casts the rope off and goes on with her reading. Good comedy.

"THE OTHER SIDE OF THE FENCE" (Majestic), August 19.—A half reel in which a small boy goes about with an augur, boring holes in houses and fences in order to look through. He sees many strange sights. Fair comedy.

"GRAND CANYON OF ARIZONA" (Majestic), August 19.—This half-reel, shown with above, gives a better idea of the immensity of the Grand Canyon than anything we have seen. The photos are not entirely clear in places, but well worth seeing as they stand.

"THE MEDIUM'S NEMESIS" (Thanhouser), August 22.—A good exposure of a spiritualistic confidence game, which holds the interest well and will be a good eye-opener to people who are sometimes misled by such things. The Thanhouser Kid unravels the medium's trick and saves the father from being duped out of $10,000 by the fake Princess Ozeb and her friends. An interesting reel.

"A SPARTAN FATHER" (Thanhouser), August 29.—The acting and characterizations in this picture are very good, but it struck us that the plot was not sufficiently plausible to carry conviction. The policeman's son grows up at the station, the idol of the men. When he is older he falls from grace and his own father traces the theft to the boy. We think the manner of the theft was too hurried, as well as the subsequent scenes at the station. The picture, however, possesses considerable interest.

"BASHFUL BACHELOR BILL" (Majestic), August 23.—This is one of the best resort comedies we have seen this summer. The bashful bachelor finds himself in a hotel filled with pretty girls. He pretends to be married, placing the photograph of an actress on his bureau. All goes well till the actress shows up at the hotel and of course trouble ensues. A lively and pleasing plot.

"THE WARD OF THE KING" (Thanhouser), August 26.—This romantic story in two reels, impressed us as an unusually good offering of the kind. Florence LaBadie and James Cruze have the leading roles. The story begins with many carefully devised scenes at the French court, in about the time of Louis XIV, it appeared. The ward escapes in boy's clothes and she and her lover go through many thrilling adventures before reaching America. The costuming is commendable and the scenes handled nicely. The experiences on the sea were exciting and the approach to American soil fills the observer with a warm glow of appreciation. The Indians had a rather "stagey" look in their first grouping. A good offering.

"THE FICKLE TRAMP" (Majestic), August 16.—The wealthy spinster offers the supposed gentleman a check for $5,000 if he will marry her. The gentleman, who poses as a poet, is about to get away with the money when his hobo friends expose him. Good light comedy.

"A HORSE ON FRED" (Majestic), August 16.—Fred Mace and his doctor friend get their medicines mixed. The horse gets an injection of whiskey which sends it under the wire a winner, and the doctor's patient is treated with horse liniment. A laughable skit.

"FOR THE FLAG" (American), August 25.—A live, high-spirited story of modern warfare, in two reels, with Kerrigan and Richardson as officers in the United States Army. Kerrigan is dismissed, as the result of his love for the colonel's daughter, whose status in the picture was never very clearly shown. The scene is transferred to Manila, where Kerrigan as a refugee begs to be allowed to fight once more for his flag. He of course is permitted to do so and wins pardon for his previous offenses. The closing scenes were a trifle hurried, but full of life and color. A good release.

"JACK MEETS HIS WATERLOO" (American), August 30.—Kerrigan comes to visit his friend, the sheriff. His popularity with the girls makes him unpopular with the men. Bill puts a job up on him, but in spite of this Jack wins the girl. The title doesn't seem to fit the picture very well —it was really Bill's Waterloo. Breezy and enjoyable.

"FROM THE PORTALS OF DESPAIR" (American), August 28.—A film of only ordinary merit, the situations for the most part being old and the whole lacking the necessary convincing quality. The setting is western, and the pictures well photographed despite their commonplace nature.

"HIS AUNT EMMA" (Crystal), August 26.—Chester sends himself a wire to the effect that his aunt is dying, so he can attend a poker party. His aunt's appearance on the scene upsets his plan. Pleasing comedy.

"THAT CRYING BABY" (Crystal), August 26.—Belmont is excessively annoyed by a neighboring baby. By a sudden turn of events it is put in his charge and he is forced to take it home. On same reel with above. A typical Crystal reel.

"SAILING UNDER FALSE COLORS" (Frontier), August 21.—This Frontier comedy has many good points. A young girl makes up as a governess and hires out to teach another girl not much younger than herself. In the end she marries the girl's father. The offering is a pleasing one.

"HIS VACATION" (Victor), August 29.—A reel of fair interest, in which James Kirkwood, office manager, has a dream. He sees himself on a vacation, during which he rescues the boss's daughter from great peril. He wakes up to find that no vacations are to be allowed that year on account of so much business.

"ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 75" (Universal), August 13.—Good subjects all through this, including the welcome of Weston in Minneapolis, presentation of loving cup to Walter Johnson, the breaking up of a gigantic smoke stack, etc.

"THE GRATITUDE OF WANDA" (Bison), August 30.—A two-reel offering, which for the most part reiterates familiar situations. The plot is the old one wherein the Indian girl brings military relief to the besieged cabin because of her gratitude to the white man who befriended her. The half-breed villain's makeup was poor and in fact all of the Indians were of a nondescript character. This follows too closely along the line of previous offerings to be of particular interest.

"THE RENUNCIATION," (Nestor), August 27.—The story of a young sheriff who is forced to arrest his sweetheart's brother. Some of the scenes in this are stirring and the story is a fair one; though not very new. The photography is not up to the Nestor standard, being very obscure and hazy in places.

"TWO HEARTS AND A THIEF" (Nestor), August 29.—An amusing half reel in which thieves interfere with an elopement. Plenty of action and a few laughs.

"CUPID'S BAD AIM" (Nestor), August 29.—A good half reel, appearing with above, in which the father marries his son's former sweetheart, much to the latter's astonishment. Well handled and quite entertaining. A good number.

"EVERYBODY'S WEARING THEM" (Powers), August 27.—Comedy of a very low type, with too much vulgarity in it for most houses. It deals with the trials and tribulations of a woman agent for a whisker gorwer. The characterizations were unattractive and the humor of no great appeal.

"WEIGHED IN THE BALANCE" (Nestor), August 25.—There is something rather pleasing in the development of this conventional story of high finance. Lee Moran puts a lot of enthusiasm into the part of the hero, who turns tables on the girl's father in the stock market. The photos are clear and it is quite an entertaining offering.

"A WOMAN'S STRATAGEM" (Rex), August 28.—A brisk one reel offering, carrying a strong stock market atmosphere. Love and financial intrigue are the plot elements. The father suspects his confidential secretary of betraying him, but the daughter, in love with the secretary, unravels the mystery and shows up the villainous partner. An improvement over recent stock market releases.

ARTHUR MACKLEY is in town. The writer on Tuesday afternoon saw a figure at the corner of Forty-third Street and Broadway that bore a familiar look. The face was turned away, but there was something in the bearing of the broad shoulders that attracted attention. Walking around him the identity was revealed. It was the famous sheriff of the Western Essanay company. Mr. Mackley was in conversation with two men plainly of the stage. Waiting for a chance to address him furnished an opportunity to look him over. A natty blue suit, tan shoes, silk shirt and Panama straw formed part of a garb that seemed singularly at variance with the well-known Western apparel of the popular director-player. As the writer "butted in" the two actors departed. An invitation was extended to the "sheriff" to cross the street and have a chat in the cafe, where last Labor Day was conceived the idea of forming the Screen Club. The invitation was accepted; then things happened. There was a narrow escape from a jam of street cars and automobiles; then when we were seated in what is now a restaurant there came a small explosion from the fan just above and a shower of sparks fell about. Just then a pest from which a picture man is never free recognized Mr. Mackley and declared himself in on the party. "Well, Sheriff, what will you have?" said the suave waiter who approached.

Mr. Mackley arrived in New York on Saturday last from a trip abroad. With him was Mrs. Mackley, who also is favorably known to picture followers, she having appeared in many of her husband's films. The Mackleys sailed from New York on May 31 with the object chiefly of visiting Scotland, the land of Mr. Mackley's birth, and incidentally of enjoying a needed vacation. It was twenty-six years since the Essanay player had crossed the water. The two visited Moville, Ireland; Point Rush, Giants Causeway, Liverpool and Beeston, and then on to London. After a stay here of four days an automobile trip was made to "Shakespeare's country"—Warwick, Leamington and Stratford. Then ten days in London were followed by a visit to Paris of the same length. Scotland was the next point, and the Mackleys stopped in Edinburgh, Ayr, Paisley and Dundee before going to Islay, where lives a brother of Mr. Mackley. It is in the latter town that is manufactured one of the best-known brands of Scotch whisky. It was a matter of concern to some of the natives that a son of Scotland should refuse to drink any of the stuff, especially when he was forced to admit that it looked as smooth as oil. But not even "old home" sentiment could induce Mr. Mackley to indulge. If his abstinence had been inspired by regard for temperance principles the offense might have been condoned, but he added insult to injury by insisting that he never did like whisky anyway.

"When we got to Glasgow," said Mr. Mackley, "we rested up four days—that is, we added two hours a day to our sleep program. Where formerly it had been 3 o'clock before we got to bed we managed to make it at 1. We left there August 9. When I heard on shipboard that the Statue of Liberty was in sight I let out a yell that you could have heard three miles. Mrs. Mackley is looking over the stores and shopping—you know she was never in New York before. Yes, I expect to be in town the rest of the week anyway. We are going around some. We went to Coney Island last night and tried to look things over down there. But it was no use. There were too many who recognized us. I said to Mrs. M, 'Come back to New York.'

"Every official treated us with great kindness while abroad. For instance, I carried over 600 cigars and a couple of pounds of tobacco. I had to declare them. Our baggage was passed without inspection. Did we have any experiences? A plenty. When we were settled in our hotel in Liverpool my wife wanted to go out and look at the town. We had hardly got fairly started when a man said to me:

"'You will excuse me, old cock, but you are the sheriff, aren't you?'

"'Not to-day—I am not,' I answered.

"He further informed me that he had just made a bet and wanted me to settle it. I asked him if I was in on the money. Rather dubiously he replied that two already were in. When I asked him what was the amount at stake he said 'Tuppence.' 'All right,' I told him, 'you win.' We walked on down the street and a crowd followed. A little chap came up to me and asked: 'Mister, would you mind tourning around and let these loidies see you?' We had to go in a store and hide ourselves.'"

Mr. Mackley was strong in his praise of the picture theaters in the British Isles. "Just to mention one in Glasgow," he said, "which goes by the very ordinary name of the Picture House. There is a chandelier which cost to build £20,000. It is of solid silver. The management has spent £247,000 on the structure to date. There is a most complete equipment. Not the least of this is an apparatus which when you put your feet on the rest provided will send a current of air up your trousers legs. Nothing but pictures are given, yet the company owning the structure is said to pay dividends of 47 per cent. There are a few seats, in the boxes, which sell at a half guinea—$2.62."

Asked if he had met on the other side any of the American players, Mr. Mackley said he missed seeing King Baggot by five minutes. He added that "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," in which Mr. Baggot not only played the title roles, but also directed as well, is going strongly in the British Isles.

Mr. Mackley has been in pictures four years. Before that he was for twenty-seven years on the stage. Many of these were spent in New York City. For seven years he was with Oliver Doud Byron in "Across the Continent" and "Ten Thousand Miles Away." He played in "Bootle's Baby" at the Madison Square Theater and also in "The Plunger." Mrs. Mackley, although for twenty-three years that has been her name, never was on the stage. She is, however, fascinated with picture work. "She has had no dramatic experience," says her husband. "She is just natural in everything she does. If in a picture she kicks you she is going to break your leg. She can't act." Picture followers will take issue with the "sheriff" on this last statement.

Asked as to the status abroad of the multiple-reel picture, Mr. Mackley was emphatic. "As true as can be," he said, "the single reel is dying. The exhibitors are calling for multiple-reel dramas and 500-foot comedies."

Earl Hudson and Roland Blaisdell, of the Standard Motion Picture Company, made a business trip to Scranton, Pa., last week. The latter brings back a story which seems to match the old one of the bird that pecked at the cherries in the painting. James O'Malley conducts the Ferguson Theater, a Universal house in Olyphant, six miles out of Scranton. Every night as the show is about to open a cat—the house cat—walks on the stage and takes up a position where it can watch the screen. There Tabby remains until the show is over. (Here is where the real story begins.) On the night the three-reel Solax feature, "Dick Whittington and His Cat," was shown, the stage cat remained passive until the rats appeared. Then it made such fierce efforts to reach the rodents that to many in the house it seemed to be on the screen. When the screen cat appeared, however, the real article instantly forsook the rats and sailed into the shadow feline.

Query: How happened it that Solax Levine missed this bet?

To most picture followers who dwell in cities, especially those of Eastern and Middle States, refreshing views of mountain and forest come only on the screen. The writer on Saturday evening was seated at a window in a picture house in a small valley town walled in by the Shawangunk Mountains. On the screen was Vitagraph's "The Strength of Men." It was old; but there were fine views of forest and stream. During the scene of the forest fire a glance out of the window put the writer not between two fires, but certainly between two forests. Over the top of the mountains the upper half of a full moon was dimly illuminating the square miles of dark mass below it. You remember the tale of the dog which starved between two bones? If in the present instance there was any predicament it was short lived. The moon won. And why not? It may be many a day before a picture theater will again yield a natural background so unusual, so impressive.

A Six-Reel Pasquali Adaptation of Alexander Manzoni's Masterpiece.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THIS is an artistic addition to the line of splendid feature plays coming from Italy, and it is distinguished for clear photography, strong characterization, scrupulous exactness in detail, some educational value, exceptional acting and a thoroughly delightful atmosphere. The period is that of the early seventeenth century, when German mercenaries overran all Lombardy at the instigation of Cardinal Richelieu and brought with them a plague through which thousands of inhabitants, especially those of Milan, perished. The swift ravages of this disease are used for dramatic purposes towards the close, and they are gruesome enough for those who delight in the horrible, but the main incidents grow out of the beauty and simple virtue of an Italian peasant girl named Lucia.

Scene from "The Betrothed" (Pasquali)

Lucia and Renzo belong to a class that has nearly always been humbly constructive, the modest and docile people who do most of the world's hard work when they are not being flimflammed in peace or slaughtered in war by the self-constituted rulers, statesmen, clergy and military leaders. They belong to the healthy and wholesome people who marry and have children, who are exponents of the home and family, who earn all they receive and live thriftily to support a lot of gentlemen engaged in bettering humankind through conquest, legislation and dogma. Looked at from a purely dispassionate point of view this arrangement is a huge joke. Those who fight on the field get neither glory nor reward; the lax, lazy and morally weak are voted into office and permitted to sit in judgment; the weaklings are usually selected for spiritual advisers; while the plain, ordinary people of sound bodies and hearts saw wood and say little.

Though the title "peasant" is a saw-edged collar for any free-born American to wear, that is about all most of us are, and we are about as meek and docile a lot as that humble class in Europe. We can therefore sympathize with Lucia and Renzo who are separated on their wedding day by the machinations of a gentleman named Don Rodrigo because he has become captivated by the charms of the young peasant girl. His attempts to captivate her are of a different nature. The story is almost entirely concerned with his plotting and scheming to get the girl in his power. He only succeeds in postponing what nature intended from the outset and all that he does reacts upon him while bringing the simple-hearted girl into steadily-growing prominence.

Much stress is laid by the producers on the delicacy and finish of their work, but the most powerful impression I received from the picture was one that held the simple folk up to admiration for their sturdy resistance under conditions rendering them almost helpless, while their "betters" represented old ideals, moth-eaten beliefs and decrepit institutions that only excite our ridicule. Those supposed glories and ancient deities are our laughing stock now just as those we are fools enough to cherish will be targets for poignant derision before this century has closed. The pomposity and pretense of the seventeenth century are deftly held up to ridicule, in contrast to the simple love of the peasant folk. The play is well handled and is being swiftly booked.

LORIMER JOHNSTON.

Lorimer Johnston, now directing the first company of the American "Flying A" players, is a native of Kentucky. He was for some years on the dramatic stage and has to his credit a series of successful productions of plays in New York, some of his own writing. Two years ago he went to Europe and for a year studied in the studios of Rome, Paris and Copenhagen. On his return to America he became a producer, in a Chicago plant, and after some time there went to the Pacific coast, where he is now director with the American Film Manufacturing Company. He has already scored with a number of two-reel productions, such as "Truth in the Wilderness," "The Scapegoat," "Adventures of Jacques" and "For the Crown."

LARGE CIRCUITS WANT "SAPHO."

Large Western theatrical circuits are reported in negotiation for the "Sapho" motion picture which New Majestic produced, and in which Florence Roberts appeared. Some of the theaters represented are houses that have never "played" a film before. Miss Roberts played her "Sapho" version in most of the houses in the flesh, and a repetition of her performance on the screen is considered a novelty by these showmen. Another thing that appealed was the certain absence of "temperament" on the part of the new "Sapho" actors. Miss Roberts' film players are guaranteed not to squabble over dressing room arrangements.

LAURA SAWYER JOINS FAMOUS PLAYERS.

Miss Laura Sawyer, until recently leading lady of the Edison Company, has severed her connections with that concern and is now associated with the Famous Players' Film Company.

Miss Sawyer is very popular with the moving picture public, and during her long connection with the Edison Company was listed among the first favorites. She has appeared in some of the most popular films released by the Edison Company, prominent among which are "Lead, Kindly Light," "For the Cause of the South," "Cliff-Dweller's Romance," "Right for Right's Sake," "Groundless Suspicion," "A Day That Is Dead," "Held Up In Holland." Miss Sawyer has been engaged to do some important work for the Famous Players.

"ONE-ROUND O'BRIEN" IS A SERIES.

About a year ago, Fred Mace staged and played in the comedy reel about a "fakey fighter" called "One Round O'Brien." The picture made a hit throughout the country and was actually featured in several first-class vaudeville theaters, including Hammerstein's, New York City. Therefore one of the original demands made on Mace by the New Majestic managers, when he joined their organization, was for a revival of the one-round-boxer. The revival film was named "One Round O'Brien Comes Back," and it came in for a good measure of popularity. World readers who have seen both pictures will recall that in the first picture, O'Brien had his accomplice back of the curtain use a mallet on the other boxer. A chloroformed sponge succeeded the mallet, in the revival film. O'Brien poked it into his opponent's face.

When the second picture was released a month ago, interested exhibitors showered New Majestic with requests for a full O'Brien series. The New Majestic management passed the requests along to Mace, who thought the matter over, and found a series practicable. "One Round O'Brien's Flirtation" is the first of the lot. In this he gets the promise of a better boxer to "lay down" for him. Then he foolishly makes the better man angry by flirting with the latter's sweetheart. The result is that the outraged better boxer trims O'Brien quick! But beaten or not, O'Brien's reappearance in a series makes the title of his revival film a fact. He has indeed come back.

GLADYS HULETTE AGAIN WITH EDISON.

After an absence of two years Gladys Hulette is again a member of the Edison Studio Stock Company. Last season Miss Hulette played the part of "Beth" during the long run of "Little Women" at the 48th Street Theater, New York. The season before that she divided between the companies of Mme. Nazimova, Bertha Kalish, and Henry Miller. Miss Hulette is now appearing in several prominent roles in Edison films, and is soon to be seen in numerous leading parts.

WESTERN VITAGRAPH PLAYERS TAKING LUNCH UNDER THE FIGTREE.

The Western Vitagraph players in the above picture are neither playing nor working. They have stopped both and are now taking their noon-day refreshments under the fig tree, which is located within the confines of the Western studios at Santa Monica, California. This is one of the bits of outdoor change in which the tropical climate of California enables the Western players to indulge.

"VITAGRAPH PRESS NOTES."

Two new directors have been added to the Vitagraph studio staff—Ned Finley and Tefft Johnson, who will in future be recognized both as directors and actors.

The hot days of August have started Directors L. Rogers Lytton and William Humphrey on their annual vacations, the former hieing himself to the seashore and the latter going to Maine, where they hope to receive fresh inspiration and renewed vigor within the next two weeks for their arduous labors of the fall and winter campaign.

Mlle. Ideal, the celebrated diver, is to be featured in a two-reel subject entitled, "The Diver," by the Vitagraph Company. The picture is now under construction and can be looked forward to as something unusual in which Mlle. Ideal will display her wonderful powers as a swimmer in a most dramatic photoplay.

On his way over from Europe, after his tour round the world, Maurice Costello enclosed his card with the address of the Vitagraph Company in a bottle, and in mid-ocean threw the bottle, containing the card, overboard.

On August 14th, he received the following letter, with the card from the bottle:

Dear Sir:

As I was walking along Hazards Beach, at Newport, R. I., I found a bottle along the seashore there, with your address in it. As a steady goer of moving pictures in our city, and thinking you might want to find out what became of the bottle, I wish to tell you I found it. Hoping to hear from you, I remain,

Your friend,

663 Thames St., Newport, R. I. JOHN F. COLLINS.

THANHOUSER IN CAPE MAY.

A Thanhouser producing company reached Cape May, the famous Jersey shore resort, early this week, to make a series of seashore stories. Lloyd Lonergan, the veteran Thanhouser scribe, went with them. Florence La Badie, William Russell and Harry Benham are the leads with the Cape May company. Carl Gregory is on the camera. He is the chap who made that ten-thousand-mile trip through the States this spring for "scenics" and got some wonderful views in the Rockies, from great and perilous heights.

ECLAIR ECHOES.

The American Eclair Company has just completed a three-reel production of "Rob Roy," and has under way a magnificent portrayal of "Evangeline," also in three reels. This company has made a number of classical productions with great success and will continue to produce recognized classics. It is a peculiar coincidence that both of these productions which are now in pictures with the Eclair trademark attached should be under preparation for production in dramatic form on Broadway this fall. It happens, however, that the Eclair Company had made arrangements to film both "Rob Roy" and "Evangeline" long before any one connected with the company had any idea that the same books were to be used for Broadway productions.

Both Jack Johnston and Miss Barbara Tennant, who have been away on vacations, are back at work at Eclair and more of those strong feature productions featuring these two favorites are under way.

* * *

When it was discovered that Millie Bright, the little Eclair beauty, is an exceptionally daring and clever diver, it was decided to stage a production in which she could do some "Kellerman" stunts. It can be expected this fall.

Helen Marten is nursing a badly bruised knee as the result of a little realism in a scene taken during the recent trip of the Eclair Company to the Adirondacks.

The artist who makes the "Newlywed" and other trick pictures over at the Fort Lee studio of Eclair has just finished a comedy subject of five hundred feet which has taken a solid month of hard work to put together. It is entitled "A Vegetarian's Dream," and shows some very amusing antics of vegetables, lemons, etc. This five hundred feet of film is made from some eighty thousand drawings and by some exceptionally clever trick work. When it comes to the showing of the lemons becoming pigs and playing leap frog, this part is not made from drawings and it will keep the public guessing for many weeks to understand how it has been done.

This unique flashlight of the audience at the "college theater" (The Majestic) at Ann Arbor, Mich., was taken on the occasion when "Steam," a Kinemacolor scientific subject, was exhibited. This reel was of special interest to the students of the University of Michigan, and shows how the brainy and ambitious youths of the country respond to every opportunity to learn something—even from the moving pictures.

Manufacturers Advance Notes

"PELLEAS AND MELISANDE."

Two-Reel 101 Bison; Released September 2nd.

This interpretation of Maurice Maeterlinck's powerful drama will undoubtedly be welcomely received, for it is a decided deviation from the present day motion picture production and presents a story rife with dramatic situations, comic pleasantries and thrilling episodes.

Scene from "Pelleas and Melisande" (101 Bison).

The picture follows the story closely. King Luchi, Melisande's foster father, is entertaining Prince Challant and his followers. As the wine flows freely their wits desert them and to pass the time merrily a game of dice is suggested. A wager is made between King Luchi and Prince Challant. If the king wins he is to have the support of the prince's followers, and if the king loses Melisande is to become the bride of Prince Challant. Melisande is sent for. She resents the insult offered her. The game goes on and the wine flows more freely. The king loses but refuses to pay the forfeit.

Melisande leaves the hall as the followers of the king and the prince battle. The prince discovers Melisande at the gate. He demands that she become his bride. She refuses and in the struggle that follows the prince is killed. Melisande wanders into the forest where Golaud finds her. The prince's henchmen follow Melisande. Golaud takes her to a priest, marries her and when the prince's followers arrive he defends her. Later he takes her to his father's castle, where Melisande meets Pelleas, the brother of Golaud.

Melisande is attracted by the charms of poetic Pelleas and acquaintanceship ripens into love. As the attachment grows, Golaud suspects the alliance between Melisande and Pelleas and spies upon them. He forces his little son, Yniold, to betray the unfaithfulness of his mother. Golaud kills Pelleas and wounds Melisande. As Melisande dies, Golaud stands beside her as she murmurs with her dying breath, "It was not a guilty love—I have not been unfaithful."

"BROKEN THREADS UNITED" (Essanay).

(In Two Parts.)

Mr. Thomas Commerford, playing the leading role of Hiram Daniels, more than demonstrates his remarkable dramatic ability. His portrayal of this character seems to be so natural that it has absolutely made the piece. Supporting Mr. Commerford, the Essanay cast, headed by Miss Doris Mitchell and Richard C. Travers, give the exhibitor and the photoplay public a thrilling drama that will be remembered long.

Scene from "Broken Threads United" (Essanay).

As an illustration of the city's lures it is strong both in theme and in acting. It is a story of one of the new kinds of bunko game that has been invented to take the place of the obsolete gold brick swindle.

Hiram Daniels, a lovable, wealthy old country widower with a charming daughter, comes alone to the city on business and is roped into a mock marriage with an adventuress. He takes his supposed wife home, and, naturally, the daughter, having a woman's perception of her sex, observes that father has picked a lemon in the garden of love. The daughter leaves for the city and her father and lover follow. They employ a detective to find her, which he does, and incidentally exposes the swindle.

HELEN GARDNER'S NEWEST PRODUCTION.

The new Helen Gardner picture, the "Princess of Bagdad," is an Arabian Nights story, filled with romance, adventure and intrigue, and containing numerous surprises. Miss Gardner appears in the role of the Princess Ojira, daughter of the Caliph, in which she wears a number of handsome costumes made from eastern fabrics several hundred years old. The costuming throughout is most elaborate and the costumes, absolutely correct in all particulars, have been made from authentic plates taken from the best works on Persia. The production is the most pretentious yet offered by the Helen Gardner company, the cast comprising thirty carefully selected artists, and the scenery and properties having taken the entire studio force of 35 men over five weeks to produce.

"THE HYPNOTIST" (Great Northern).

This is an excellent one-reel comedy which is built around a subject never before presented in moving pictures. The fun-making crew of the Great Northern acting forces are seen at their best and the result is a most enjoyable film comedy. Jack and Jim, according to the story, are in love with the same girl and each is endeavoring to use all the arts of persuasion to win her over. Jack is stout and jolly and Jim is thin and prides himself upon being an amateur hypnotist. At a house party Jim displays his cleverness to good advantage and succeeds in keeping the guests amused. This angers Jack, who stoutly maintains that the hypnotic spell is simply a fake and that he defies anyone to place him under the influence. Jim accepts the challenge and proceeds to do the Svengali act with his rival. There is immediate action. The portly Jack is made to believe that he is a gallant soldier and after being supplied with a military cap and toy musket marches throughout the house in quest of the imaginary enemy. He encounters all sorts of obstacles and manages to overcome them through the medium of demolishing almost everything in sight, although human life is spared. The warfare of the "General" might have gone on for an indefinite period had not Jim been notified of the dilemma. At that precise moment the amateur hypnotist was courting the girl in the story and at her behest he consents to awaken Jack from his hypnotic spell. The finale is amusing and, of course, Jack accepts the inevitable when he is told of the depredations he has committed while under the spell of hypnotism. It is an amusing little conceit.

Scene from "The Hypnotist" (Great Northern).

HISTORICAL FILM COMPANY GROWING.

Eustace Hale Ball, a well-known Harvard graduate, who recently purchased the Historical Film Company at One Madison Avenue, New York, has secured the services of Walter R. Lewis to manage his photographic department. Mr. Lewis has been prominent in portrait and newspaper photography throughout the country for twenty-two years and is proving very successful in the cinematographic work. The city studios and laboratories of the Historical Film Company have been opened on East 23rd Street, although the executive offices will remain in the Metropolitan Building.

Garfield Thompson, the well-known photoplaywright and a former star with the Reliance and Majestic forces, will direct some of the early productions of the Historical Film Company. Mr. Ball is beginning upon some historical scenarios written by Edward S. Ellis, B. A., the famous historian and author of the "History of the United States," "High 12," etc., etc.

COBB MOVES RAMO PRESS DEPARTMENT.

C. Lang Cobb, Jr., general director of publicity and sales of the Ramo Films Company, has transferred his offices from wherever they were to the Columbia Theater Building, New York. This move was made in order that Mr. Cobb might be in closer proximity to the Cobb Motion Picture Bureau, of which he is president. The entire trade is invited to call at the new offices.

THREE RELIANCE DRAMAS.

Vivian Prescott, Norma Phillips and Edgena de Lespine are the popular stars featured in the coming week's Reliance program, and each of these well-known beauties is seen in a role best suited to her particular talents.

In the release of Monday, August 25th, Norma Phillips appears in "The Girl Spy's Atonement," in which she plays a role calling for the strongest kind of acting amid the excitement of camp life and the horrors of the battlefield. Miss Phillips rises to the occasion with splendid effect.

Vivian Prescott will be seen in the title role of the release of Wednesday, August 27th, "Peg of the Polly P." This versatile little actress, acknowledged to be one of the cleverest performers in filmdom, plays the part of "Peg," the daughter of a canal boat captain, amid the picturesque settings of the Lehigh Valley. This is one of the quaintest and most interesting productions of the season.

Scene from "The Social Secretary" (Reliance).

Edgena de Lespine will be seen on Saturday, August 30th, in the name part of "The Social Secretary," which is excellently adapted to her queenly style of beauty and gives her ample opportunity to display her exceptional ability as an emotional actress so well remembered in her portrayal of "The Bawlerout."

"SOME" FIREMAN (Gaumont).

This is a scintillating comedy on the Gaumont order. It will tickle the risibilities of the most fastidious person, and will soon have him convulsed in laughter. The theme of the story revolves around the peculiar actions of a young fellow who imagines himself showered with the affections of a popular musical comedy actress. Things run his way until one morning he receives an anonymous letter that entirely disillusions him as to the sincerity of his adored. In order to ascertain the truthfulness of the letter he meets the actress after the first act. Her reception of him is near the freezing point. Notwithstanding the fact that her actions tend to bear out the truth of the letter, the love-sick young man changes places with the theater fireman. What he is enabled to perceive of his adored quenches his flame of love, and after giving the fire chief an impromptu bath, he vows, as he is being led to the "cooler," that he will never chase after musical comedy satellites again.

Scene from "Some" Fireman (Gaumont).

"SIGN OF THE BLACK LILY," Cines Mystery Story.

"The Sign of the Black Lily" is the title of the Kleine-Cines Release for Tuesday, September 2nd. Essentially this is a dramatic story, in two reels, combining a delightful tale of adventure with those wonderful stage settings for which Kleine-Cines pictures are famous: How a wary old white-haired favorite of the clubs and drawing rooms is exposed as the leader of a gang of thieves, how an enterprising detective wormed his way into the foul heart of the most vicious and corrupt organization in all Paris, how by finding secret buttons walls moved, and floors disappeared revealing strange hiding places of the gang. The valiant fight of the police against overwhelming odds and the dramatic unmasking of the sleek villain in his own reception room crowded with guests makes a film delightful for its strong situations, condensing acting and clever story.

Scene from "Sign of the Black Lily" (Cines).

SPIDER GANG TESTIMONIAL.

P. P. Craft, of the Apex Film Co., 145 W. 45th Street, New York, is rather proud of the following "three-in-one" testimonial received from Mr. Chas. H. Streimer, manager of the Eagle Feature Film Co., of New York City. Here is the letter:

"Dear Sir—Kindly keep us posted on all your future releases, for the following reason: We purchased from you 'On the Trail of the Spider Gang,' and the result is that we have added twenty new customers to our weekly account. Isn't that reason enough?

"Mr. N. Chalk, of the Unique Theatre, on 14th Street, said: 'Book me for the Spider Gang for a full week instead of three days; the first proved a record breaker.'

"Mr. J. Tenzer, of the Metropolitan Theater, said: 'The Spider Gang is the best feature I have had.' This feature was at the Metropolitan Theater for two days, where it broke all records, and Mr. Tenzer's competitor took it three days later."

ECLECTIC FEATURE NOTES.

The Eclectic Film Company has disposed of the State rights to the "Mysteries of Paris," and "Nero and Britannicus," to Exclusive Features, Inc., 24 East 21st Street, New York City, for Greater New York and Northern New Jersey.

The State rights for the upper part of New York State for the "Mysteries of Paris" and "Nero and Britannicus" have been disposed of to McIntire & Richter, 23 East 14th Street, New York City.

There is very little territory left open for either one of the above mentioned feature productions. Prospective buyers should make haste to secure territory before the last opportunities have passed.

OFF FOR SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. Charles A. Pryor, President of The Yale Feature Film Co., of 1547 Broadway, New York, accompanied by three camera men and a company of ten people, will soon leave for South America to make a big special feature picture for his concern.

Mr. Pryor and his company expect to be gone for six months, and to make a tour of the South American countries, making one big special picture on the Amazon River.

The Yale Feature Film Co. at present is engaged in making 7,000 feet of film for The Chamber of Commerce, at Cleveland.

"SOLDIERS OF FORTUNE" IN PICTURES.

The All-Star Feature Corporation announces that negotiations have been concluded for the acquisition of "Soldiers of Fortune," one of the most popular novels of the past decade, by Richard Harding Davis, and later dramatized by Augustus Thomas. The author has granted to the All-Star Feature Corporation the sole rights to the book and the rights for use of the play have been granted by the Henry B. Harris estate. Augustus Thomas is preparing the scenario for motion picture reproduction and "Soldiers of Fortune" with a star cast will be the second release.

"Arizona," the first All-Star Feature Corporation's play in motion pictures, is nearing completion. Messrs. Thomas and McGill have been handling an army of men and horses during the past three weeks. The heaviest of the two hundred and ten scenes required to present the play have already been made. The first three thousand feet of positive film, showing the progress of the work, was projected at the company's exhibition rooms the other day, for the benefit of the officers of the company and a few of the leading players. So far the general quality is excellent. "Arizona" is scheduled for release about September 15th.

SIR FORBES-ROBERTSON IN "HAMLET."

The "Hamlet," which will be released by the Gaumont Company, in North America, is a fine conception, and in this screened version of Shakespeare's masterpiece Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson and Miss Gertrude Elliott (Lady Robertson) are supported by the full strength of their Drury Lane Company. This is a guarantee of efficiency, artistry, and success. The zenith of perfection could not have been attained had the feat been attempted with anything less. Sir Johnston has expressed his belief in the value of motion pictures as a means of spreading widecast a knowledge of the stagecraft of Shakespeare.

Sir Johnston and Lady Robertson both witnessed the production a week or two ago and were highly delighted at the success of their first appearance in a picture play; and well might they be so, for the acting, staging, and whole construction of Shakespeare's tragedy is absolutely superb throughout. The scenery has been most admirably chosen, and the castle at Lulworth Cove provides one of the finest and most picturesque settings. The scene on the battlements, where the ghost of Hamlet's father appears, is a veritable chef d'oeuvre, and will cause boundless wonder and elicit admiration from audiences in every portion of the civilized globe.

"THE POISONED CHOP."

The "Flying A" productions recently released have been of a somewhat different type than the customary Western and have created no little favorable comment. In the subject, "The Poisoned Chop," to be released September 4th, the company directed by Tom Ricketts, and headed by Ed Coxen, have demonstrated their versatility. One would scarcely believe the title to indicate a comedy, but this the subject is, nevertheless, and a very good one at that.

The contention is about a collie dog which has apparently replaced the boy in the affections of Mrs. Green. Accordingly the dog is doomed and all other methods of disposing of the dog having failed, poison is resorted to. The chop with a liberal portion of poison is duly placed before the dog, but it travels from one place to another and finally is served at the Green dining table. The evolution of the various angles of the plot give rise to many ludicrous situations which must be seen to be fully appreciated.

Simplex Quality Wins

You Can't Keep a Good Machine Down

Quality in a projector means, first—a perfect picture on the screen; second—satisfactory results continuously during months and years of hard service. Most any motion picture machine will project a good picture when new, but in order to accomplish the second result, you must have Simplex quality of materials and precision of workmanship, combined with our wonderful Simplex design, which makes the operator's work a delight.

The proof is hundreds of satisfied customers all over the world, many unfilled orders for machines and a factory which is working overtime.

Don't fail to investigate the Simplex.

A WONDERFUL FILM OF THE U. S. NAVY.

A film in five masterful parts, which has been heralded as the world's greatest spectacular war drama, and which is to be marketed under the title of Victory, is one of the few films shown during the life of motion pictures, which has not belied its heralding in one single adjective. It is everything that is claimed for it and then some.

To J. Parker Read, Jr., the daring young director of motion pictures who gave to us the films of the Raising of the Maine, must be handed another laurel wreath for the marvelous work and direction he now hands to us in picture form, in this same Victory.

The entire picture has been produced with the co-operation of the U. S. Navy and no less distinguisht personages than Josephus Daniels, secretary of the navy; Admiral Badger, commander-in-chief of the Atlantic fleet; Commander Benson, and many other officers of the navy, have an acting part thruout the entire production.

The story woven around the thrills and deeds of daring which are so vividly depicted in the five reels, is deserving of special commendation. It is exceptionally well played thruout even to those characters of the distinguisht officers which were portrayed by themselves. Special mention must be made of the capable work done by Anna Lehr and Arthur Hurl in the leading characters of Helen Gordon and Lieutenant Ward.

The ensemble numbers of the production, in which the center of the action is always the sailors or marines are well handled in every instance and the work in direction of J. Parker Read is predominant thruout every scene.

Particularly well done are the scenes of the battle between the death-dealing war hydroplanes. The views of the rising and approach the water, the dropping of bombs upon the men of war, the battle with the forts and the working of the aeroplane destroying guns.

What there has been omitted, that might satisfy the appetites of those who crave the exciting, can not be imagined.

The exploding of full-charge harbor mines, throwing up columns of water more than three hundred feet into the air, the destruction of the forts with shot and shell; the hand-to-hand encounters are all most realistic.

The film is a credit to the producers and it will be hard for anyone to strike upon a more popular subject for public appeal for many days to come.

A STUPENDOUS PRODUCTION IN FIVE PARTS

UNDER THE PERSONAL DIRECTION OF J. PARKER READ JR.

This stupendous feature cost over $40,000 to produce, but it contains a hundred thrills which a MILLION DOLLARS could not have purchased!

Can you imagine a modern American battleship destroying a foreign fort, capped by a climax when a famous navy aviator leaves the battleship in his war hydroplane, and at the speed of a mile a minute dashes through the smoke clouds of battle and drops a bomb which destroys the enemy's fortifications?

PHILADELPHIA.

THE Calehuff Supply Company, Inc., recently installed a large mirror screen for Charles D. Silcox in his new theater, the Bridesburg, at Bridge and Richmond streets. Mr. F. Mano, from the Mirror Screen Company's factory, located at Shelbyville, Ind., superintended the installation of the large glass screen.

George Graff, of the Exclusive Film Service Company, is preparing for a big fall business and is ordering a large number of commercial reels.

Arthur Heymann, of the Calehuff Supply Company, Inc., has returned from a trip throughout the State of Pennsylvania, and reports exhibitors highly pleased with the present business conditions.

Lew Kamineo, the popular operator at the Mirror Theater, has been elected to membership in Local 37, Operators' Union of Philadelphia.

The Finance Company of Pennsylvania, have awarded a contract for the building of a moving picture theater at Juniper and Market streets.

Chris Peterson, representing Fred G. Nixon-Nirdlinger, purchased the United States Hotel property at Tamaqua, Pa., for $50,000, upon which a modern theater will be erected.

The Famous Players' Film Service recently was granted a charter under the laws of Delaware, with a capital of $12,000. Norman P. Coffin, of Wilmington, is at the head of the concern, which also has its headquarters at Wilmington.

Seventy vaudeville theaters and motion picture halls are in process of construction in this city. Virtually all of them will open early in the fall, making an approximate total of 350 places of amusement in Philadelphia, excluding the large downtown playhouses devoted to legitimate drama. All of these theaters will run moving pictures as part or all of their programs. At least $5,000,000 is said to have been invested in new theater-building enterprises. Motion picture houses are springing into existence throughout the city. It is deemed quite probable, too, that several of the burlesque houses will be used for motion pictures this season. It is persistently reported that Marcus Loew, whose leasing of the Metropolitan Opera House for vaudeville excited widespread comment, has also rented the Chestnut Street Opera House for vaudeville. This house, which for thirty years has been the headquarters of J. Fred Zimmerman, is being extensively renovated. The front will be moved back five feet and interior improvements made.

Walter Evans, with Thomas A. Edison, Inc., stopped off in Philadelphia for a few days last week, enroute for the factory at East Orange, N. J. Mr. Evans states that the exhibitors in the South and West are highly pleased with the business done during the past three months, and that they are making big preparations for the fall and winter shows.

I. Summerfield, of the Improved Features, has sailed for Europe, and expects to return with a quantity of good feature films in September. Howard Gosner will take charge of the bookings during Mr. Summerfield's absence.

Robert Lynch announces the opening of the Pekin Feature Exchange at 1313 Vine street, which will handle a line of high-class productions of various subjects, and made by prominent manufacturers. B. Oragoer will have charge of the bookings.

Harry B. Reynolds, owner of the Atlantic Pier Airdome, of Wildwood, N. J., was a city visitor last week, making arrangements for a month's bookings. Mr. Reynolds is about the only exhibitor in that city who has an established patronage, which was built up by showing the very best of pictures. It is generally known that Wildwood is over-run with picture theaters, thus making competition so great that not one of the houses makes more than expenses. It has gone so far, that one of the large realty companies has built a free picture show on the boardwalk.

William Eckland & Sons are having plans prepared for the erection of a picture theater on East Girard avenue. The building will be of brick and terra cotta, and will be one story in height, 35 by 100 feet.

J. Belbin has awarded a contract to the Joseph Levin Company for the erection of a picture theater at 1106-8 North Fortieth street. The building will be 35 by 100 feet, and will embody many new ideas in the construction of motion picture houses.

Mr. F. A. Clark, of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company, Inc., recently returned from a trip along the Atlantic Coast in the interest of the Motiograph machine.

Louis Fein is having plans prepared for a moving picture theater, 32 by 116 feet, to be erected at Seventh and Moore streets.

L. W. Atwater, of the Nicholas Power Company, was a visitor in Philadelphia last week among the moving picture supply men. He reports that many Power machines are being installed throughout the country, and that orders are being received quite heavily by all the distributors.

A new motion picture theater is to be erected at Fifth street and Moyamensing avenue for Cahn & Gross. The building will be of concrete and occupy a site 70 by 90 feet.

CONGDON.

ILLINOIS.

PRESIDENT F. J. MILNES, of the National Indoor Game Association of Evanston, Ill., has addressed another letter to small town merchants in the State, asking that some provision be made for the amusement of the young people. He says: "Young couples want some place to go in the evening. If you have no theater, why not build one? At least you could maintain a moving picture show. Young men love to play billiards. See that they have a good, clean room for that purpose. Open up a large, well ventilated hall. See that it is properly supervised. Do not become hostile and prohibitive. But, appoint a sane censor committee to inspect all public places of recreation, something like the recently established commission in Detroit, Mich."

Ellis Worthington has sold the Opera House at Melvin, to C. A. Platz.

William Braucher has accepted a position as piano player at the Gem Theater in Lincoln.

The Coliseum, which was recently opened as a picture house at Paxton, by O. M. Young, will play vaudeville the last three nights of each week, when an admission of fifteen cents will be secured. The price will remain at ten cents for the three-reel picture show. Another innovation at this house is Saturday matinees.

Bert Culkin, pianist, and Ben Warrick, violinist, at the Star Theater in Lincoln, have resigned their positions to join a road show.

The Pastime Theater, at East Moline, has been reopened, after it had been closed for two weeks for improvements. The interior has been redecorated and an indirect lighting system installed.

T. C. German, of Athens, was arrested for distributing advertising bills for his moving picture show at that place without a bill poster's license. The case was dismissed by the justice of the peace.

The People's Amusement Company, of Danville, Ill., has been incorporated, with a capital stock of $5,000. The incorporators are: William Canaday, Frank H. Ramsey and Lawrence G. Griffith.

E. G. Newman, one of the lessees of the Majestic Theater, at LaSalle, has been selected to manage the new Bijou, which is being erected by the La Salle Enterprise Company. The house will play vaudeville.

W. A. Peterson has returned from Quincy to Bloomington, and has purchased the Colonial Theater on North Main Street, and will operate it.

The Granite City Commercial Club had a series of moving pictures taken in that city.

The Herald-Transcript, of Peoria, gave two tickets to the Majestic picture show free with every want ad inserted in the Sunday paper.

The value of moving pictures as a help in education, was impressed upon students of the Illinois State Normal University, at Normal, by William J. Morrison, of Brooklyn, N. Y. "The pictures represent action," he said, "and all people are interested in action. The pictures are a great force in education where the children cannot read or write. Many different phases of life can be shown by the pictures, such as work in the industrial world. The development of a butterfly from the cocoon to the flying insect can be shown in about thirty seconds. The life of a plant from the time the seed is planted to blooming can be shown. An interesting picture is the life of chicken in the egg. These pictures are taken by means of X-rays at different intervals. Many men are now hunting to show the conditions in the animal world, and to get pictures of geography problems. With the pictures the whole world can be brought to the schools and towns, but strict ordinances should be passed to guard against moral dangers."

A number of fresh air children of Chicago, have been enjoying an outing near Fairbury, and Manager Phil Wade, of the Central Opera House, has extended an invitation to all to attend the picture show any and every night, free of charge. St. S. Herman, proprietor of the Globe, at Monticello, made a similar offer.

Jake Szold, of the firm of Joseph Szold & Son, of Peoria, is interested in the Garden Theater, to be erected at Garden and Adams streets. The theater, which will cover a ground space of 48 x 120 feet, will be devoted to the photoplay. It will cost $10,000 or $12,000.

S. T. Herman, proprietor of the Globe Theater, at Monticello, has been worried by his defamers, and recently published the following admonition: "To the Liars of Monticello: It has been circulated that S. T. Herman's Globe Theater was closed Tuesday night, and that he, S. T. Herman, had gone bankrupt. Now I want to disqualify any such statement. And further, I will pay a reward of $25 to any person furnishing me the evidence of any party or parties starting any such lies. It is high time that such people should be prosecuted, as there seems to be a number of gossipers in our city that attend to other people's business more than they do to their own."

Laurel Clemens, farmer and moving picture show proprietor, is said to have successfully used his automobile to furnish power for the performances which he gives Thursday and Saturday nights at Ipava.

The Zion City "Independent" champions the moving picture and discusses the action of the Voliva council in prohibiting moving pictures. The editor says: "The question arises as to whether the council of this city, or any other city, can keep the moving picture industry out. Mr. Rice can come back upon the city council for damages. First, he will have to prove in the courts, perhaps in the Supreme Court, that the moving picture is a civic right which no municipal council can constitutionally debar. It certainly has its place as an educator. It is being used in the schools, used to teach lessons in history, language, geography, etc., and Mr. Rice has gone to no small pains in bringing to the city the best he could secure. Some of the reels given have been magnificent. They have been highly instructive. The Voliva council might as well shoot peas at the sun as to try to debar from this city the moving picture as an industry. They may block it for a time, but not permanently. They might as well pass an ordinance against the right to read." When it announced it would reopen on a recent date, Capt. Walker and a force of 150 deputy sheriffs were ready to take charge of things, but no attempt was made to open the house.

MIDWEST SPECIAL SERVICE.

BUFFALO.

WITH a capital of $50,000, the Jefferson Exhibition Co. has been organized in Buffalo. The concern will engage in the moving picture and exhibition business. The directors namer are: Hiram C. Harrison, C. Lee Abell and Martin Pleuthner, all of Buffalo.

McMahon & Dee, theatrical agents of 385 Washington street, Buffalo, have successfully conducted the moving picture and vaudeville theater and other amusement features at Olcott Beach, a Lake Ontario summer resort. They took care of many thousand persons at the recent reunion of the Niagara County Pioneers' Association at that place.

Harry Marsey, of the Happy Hour moving picture theater, Buffalo, was recently interviewed by a local newspaper. According to the printed report, he estimates that patrons of the sixty-eight moving picture houses of this city have paid $1,423,500 to see the shows during the past year. The write-up also says in part: "The entire moving picture business in Buffalo is estimated at being worth $2,000,000. In the moving picture business in Buffalo there are about 1,000 persons employed, including cashiers, operators, ushers, ticket takers, singers and pianists."

Manager A. R. Sherry, of the New Lyric Theater, recently used a musical comedy feature as an added attraction to his regular programme of vaudeville and moving pictures.

A recent Canadian report says in part: "Managers of moving picture houses in Montreal are about to approach the Board of Control of this city with a petition that the present by-law forbidding the admission of children under sixteen years of age to moving picture theaters, unless accompanied by one of their parents or a guardian, be repealed. The existence of the present Board of Censors in Ontario and Quebec, the moving picture men say, makes the by-law unnecessary."

Manager Henry Marcus, of the Academy Theater, is arranging for a strong bill of moving pictures and vaudeville during the Perry Centennial celebration here the week of September 2d. A record-breaking crowd is expected in Buffalo that week.

Many Buffalo clergymen have been loud in their praises of the moving picture production of "Quo Vadis?" which Manager John Laughlin, of the Majestic Theater has been featuring as a summer attraction. These are the George Kleine pictures. Buffalonians hope Mr. Kleine will bring here "The Last Days of Pompeii" production. Manager Laughlin will open the regular season of his theater with Neil O'Brien's minstrels.

The Central Park Amusement Co. have installed a Wurlitzer motion picture orchestra, Style H, in their theater at Main street and Fillmore Avenue, Buffalo. This moving picture house is high class and seats 1,100 persons. This instrument furnishes 10-piece orchestra music and can be played by hand or automatically.

Bernard Vohwinkle, proprietor of the Oriole Theater, 1592 East Genessee street, Buffalo, has installed a Worlitzer motion picture orchestra, Style G.

Manager Charlie Bowe, of Keith's moving picture theater, is planning to spring some surprises during the coming Perry Centennial celebration. He says it is too early to give details.

The Teck Theater, managed by John R. Olshei, has been showing the Paul J. Rainey African Hunt pictures. Mr. Olshei will have his own moving picture theaters, on Virginia street and on Auburn avenue.

Excursion Manager Chambers, of Erie Beach, which has a moving picture theater, booked many big excursions for that resort this season.

Henry S. Fisher, general manager of Crystal Beach, near here, has a moving picture theater as one of his midway attractions. Hundreds of little girls, who recently took part in a doll show at that resort, also visited the picture show.

Harry G. Johnson, E. C. Sutton and L. H. Sutton have bought Carnival Court, a Buffalo summer park, for $125,000. There is a moving picture show at the resort. The owners improve the park.

BILLY BISON.

"THE MOST FASCINATING PICTURE,"

Your audience will say. You'll sit up and take notice when seeing this out-of-the-ordinary film-story, replete with thrilling situations and ending in a duel that sends a chill down your spine. One, three and six sheet posters; heralds; cuts. Review in next week's number.

"THE CREAM OF THE EUROPEAN MARKET SELECTED FOR AMERICA"

LOUISVILLE.

A RECENT sale of a moving picture outfit by the Harry K. Lucas Film Company, of Louisville, illustrates the extent to which moving pictures are being used in educational work. The sale in question was made to the Rev. O. P. Ackerman, pastor of the Church of St. Philip Neri, at Floyd and Woodbine streets, Louisville. The clergyman will use the outfit in showing travel and other educational films in Winhurst Hall, the parish house, which is connected with the church.

Ed. Clay's Westonia Airdome, located at Twenty-sixth and Alford streets, in Louisville, has been doing a splendid business with a good run of pictures, handling crowds every night. Mr. Clay is also business manager of the Louisville Operators' local.

Manager Rowland Clark, who is handling the New Alamo Theater, at Lebanon, Ky., for T. M. Estes, was in Louisville recently, visiting the local film exchanges and looking out for feature films which would go well at his house.

R. S. Shrader has taken charge of the Louisville office of the Central Film Service Company, following the departure of A. F. Mayer for his new work in Chicago. Mr. Shrader has been in charge of the Indianapolis office of the company, and is also familiar with Louisville, as he established the local office about a year ago and installed Mr. Mayer.

Carpenter & Johnson are keeping B. F. Keith's Theater supplied with an interesting run of local pictures, recent films showing the big picnic and barbecue, with swimming races and other amusements, at Spring Bank Park, on the Ohio; a demonstration of the operation of the pulmotor, and others of more than ordinary interest .

"The Prince of Evil," a Vitagraph special, drew remarkably well as the feature film at the Orpheum last week.

The Louisville Health Department took occasion, in the current issue of its monthly bulletin, "Health and Hygiene," to issue a special warning directed against ill-ventilated moving picture houses. It is pointed out that the great increase in the number of such theaters, and the practically universal interest in them, has resulted in the use of many old store and other buildings, which are entirely unsuited to the purpose, from the standpoint of sanitation, and even of comfort. There is at present no ordinance requirement regarding the construction of public halls of any sort in that particular, and the Board suggests that the best, if not the only way of putting an end to the badly-ventilated theater, is not to patronize it. There are some Louisville houses to which the warning applies very pertinently, although it is only fair to state that, for the most part, ventilation is one of the first considerations with those in charge, especially in new houses.

Harry Bartram, of Lexington, Ky., has leased a building in Frankfort, Ky., in which he will open an up-to-date moving picture show about September 15.

The New Hippodrome, at Lexington, Ky., will certainly be ready for the opening on September 22, according to the management, as work is progressing very satisfactorily. The walls have reached a height of about 15 feet, and the joists and a temporary floor have been laid on the stage, which is about 30 by 50 feet, with ample dressing-room space beneath. New scenery is being painted by a famous Chicago studio, and all material is on hand with which to rush the building to completion as rapidly as possible.

Col. Dick Martin, manager of the Columbia and Edisonia theaters, at Ashland, Ky., and of the Empire, at Ironton, O., directly across the river from Ashland, is extending his holdings still further. He has just leased the Scenic Theater at Ironton, the largest vaudeville and moving picture house in that city, and the Placade, at Huntington, W. Va., a new $90,000 house just completed. This gives Col. Martin theaters in three states. He intends to fit them up in uniformly complete and modern style, planning to erect a new building on the site of the Edisonia, and to enlarge the building in which the Columbia is located.

The Needham Amusement Company, operating one of the leading moving picture houses at Middlesboro, Ky., has filed amended articles of incorporation, changing its name to the Leman Amusement Company.

Clay Pumphrey, who has been holding down the position of operator at the Auditorium Theater, Danville, Ky., for some time, has resigned to seek fresh fields, and has been succeeded by Charles Bryant, who has had plenty of experience in that work.

Manager Scott's new motion picture house in Cloverport, Ky., which recently opened after extensive improvements and much brightening-up work, has been handling a good business after the lay-off devoted to the renovating work, and the high class attractions presented have met with unqualified approval from the people in that vicinity.

Clarence Owens, of Horse Cave, Ky., has been busy organizing a company to erect and operate a moving picture house in that city. He was in Louisville recently looking over equipment and making investigations as to film service.

Hooker & Wells, the enterprising pair operating the Scenic Theater, at Scottsburg, Ind., have improved their house with some new opera chairs recently.

The Henryville Amusement Company, of Henryville, Ind., has been organized by Levy & Praul, to operate a moving picture theater there. The company has purchased and converted into a theater an old schoolhouse in Henryville, which answers the purpose admirably, being well ventilated and having ample room for seating a large audience.

The Harry K. Lucas Film Company recently sold to C. A. Wheeldon, of Broadhead, Ky., a gas outfit for use in the operation of his photoplay house at that place.

For the amusement of the numerous guests from all over Kentucky who attend the resort, the management of the hotel at Crab Orchard Springs, Ky., made arrangements some time ago with L. A. Sanders, to operate and manage a moving picture theater right in the hotel. The idea caught on instantly, giving the guests something to do in the summer evenings when dancing or driving had palled, and moving pictures will probably be a permanent feature of the hotel's summer program hereafter.

Manager Proud has recently opened his new place at Cynthiana, Ky., and reports that business has been all that could be asked. The house was built early in the summer, and is one of the prettiest and best equipped in that part of the State.

Lewis Burg, of Louisville, is with Montana Dan, the Western character who is making the rounds of the Louisville houses just now, with a round-up feature film. Montana Dan's outfit has a big front display of canvas, depicting life in the wild and woolly West, with a varied assortment of skins, saddles, guns and cow-puncher paraphernalia generally. He is handling big business at all of the houses.

With a view to enlarging her playhouse at some future date, Mrs. Anna M. Bueche, owner of the theater on the West side of Colerain avenue, in Cincinnati, O., has purchased thirty additional feet adjoining her place from William P. and C. B. Hulbert.

Jake Wells, of Chattanooga, Tenn., is looking for a good location on which to erect a new theater in that city, but has not yet been able to select a site. He will probably make his selection from several Market street locations which he now has under consideration.

CINCINNATI.

ARRANGEMENTS were completed recently for holding a big outing at Chester Park, by Cincinnati Local No. 2, of the Motion Picture Exhibitor's League. The affair will be given Thursday, September 4, and until that time the screens of a hundred houses will herald the event. The contracts for the picnic were signed by Charles Weigel, representing the League, and Manager I. M. Martin, of Chester Park. Several moving picture men will be on hand with cameras on the day of the outing, to take pictures of the crowds. The picture will be shown later in the city.

What is regarded as one of the most up-to-the-minute features of the moving picture in the city was the photographing of the flight of Miss Stinson, an aviatrice, performing during the past week at Coney Island. Miss Stinson, carrying a passenger, was up about fifty feet when her engine went wrong. A moving picture operator at the time had his machine in position, taking views of the first woman operator of an aeroplane carrying a passenger in these parts. Without warning the machine fell to the ground. The cameraman, having his camera focused on the machine in its flight, succeeded in getting a good view of the fall and the subsequent smash-up when the aeroplane hit the ground. The pictures were shown at a local theater.

Acting upon instructions from Building Commissioner Rapp, Chief of Police Copelan recently ordered closed the Orpheum Moving Picture Theater in West Fifth street. Commissioner Rapp issued his orders after he declared the management of the theater had failed to comply with his instructions to make changes that were designed to improve the safety of the theater. Upon request of the Mayor, City Auditor Washburn revoked the license of W. H. Wilson, proprietor of the theater.

A municipal moving picture theater is the latest innovation at the City Hall. It was established there in the old police shooting range by Chief Electrician Bert Sturdevant of Building Commissioner Rapp's office. Sturdevant equipped the range with a screen and installed the moving picture machine. The outfit will be used in the examination of moving picture operators before they are granted licenses.

The State of Ohio has gone into the moving picture business on a small scale. The first endeavor of the State along these lines is a 3,000-foot film depicting the places where tuberculosis germs are born and the manner in which steps should be taken towards eliminating this grim spectre, the tolls of which, in this State alone, are 7,000 annually.

Applications for a receiver for the Imperial Theater, in McMicken avenue, near Mohawk place, and an accounting from J. St. Clair Blassmeyer, president and manager of the company, and owner of 545 shares of the stock of the company, was made in Common Pleas Court recently. The petition was filed by Charles W. Hine and others, owning 242 shares of stock of the theater company. It is charged by Hine and his associates, that Glassmeyer is mismanaging the business of the company. They say he has built a balcony at an expense of about $3,500, which was not needed; is selling tickets without keeping proper account, and also loaning the moneys of the company, all without consent of the other stockholders. As Glassmeyer was not represented by an attorney, Judge Nippert, before whom the application was made, continued the hearing.

"Viewing Cincinnati," from the highest building West of New York, the new thirty-four-story Union Central Building, was the treat extended to Cincinnatians last week at a local moving picture house, where citizens for the first time viewed the scenes surrounding them from the top of a skyscraper.

In a decision recently handed down by Judge Gorman, of the Common Pleas Court, the ordinance which compelled owners of moving picture shows to have licensed operators was knocked out. Under the ordinance the operator was compelled to pass an examination and then get a license from the Building Commissioner. The court's decision was in the case of Sam Lewis, who, after his arrest, asked for a writ of habeas corpus through attorneys, and the decision was based on this action. Judge Gorman declared the ordinance illegal because there was no standard of qualification. He said this could be readily amended by council.

IN THE NORTHWEST.

THE Detroit Theater Corporation, operating the Bijou Theater in Detroit, was granted a temporary injunction by Judge Murphy, restraining State Fire Marshal Winship from forcing him to close the theater because of alleged inadequate fire protection. The fire marshal was ordered to show cause why the theater should be closed. Another angle in the fight of the fire marshal was the cutting of wires at the Orpheum and another theater in Lansing by Deputy Marshal Samuel Robinson.

Frank Simons has arranged a series of moving picture shows in Montana towns, showing one each week at Camas, Plains, Paradise, Polson, St. Ignatius, Ronan and Dixon.

The new board of censors in North Yakima, Wash., recently prohibited the exhibition of Kentucky feud pictures at the Majestic Theater.

The Majestic, at Milwaukee, Wis., has ended its picture season and returned to vaudeville.

The Laemmle Film Company took pictures of the Lake Harriet Canoe Club, at Minneapolis, Minn.

MOVING pictures, taken in all parts of the county, will be an attraction at the county fair at Connersville, Ind.

Officials of the Indiana National Guard made arrangements to have moving pictures taken of the annual encampment of the State militia. The pictures will be shown throughout the State and the proceeds used for the benefit of the various companies.

The East Ohio Gas Company had 1,500 feet of film made of the new $2,000,000 pipe which takes gas from West Virginia to Cleveland, Ohio. The film was booked at a number of Cleveland theaters.

Three moving picture men of Crawfordville, Ind., opened their houses on Sunday, because the Cryal band was permitted to go ahead with its two concerts at the Chautauqua in that city. No admission fee was charged.

John Y. Bassell, manager of the conventions and publicity bureau, at Columbus, Ohio, will use moving pictures to exploit the city to secure conventions. They will be shown at meetings held at Columbus, and will also be sent to other gatherings.

Fred E. Einspahr, Oscar Larson and Ed. H. Williams, will erect a new picture theater at Odebolt, Ia.

J. A. Meades will erect a new moving picture theater at Sioux Rapids, Ia.

IN THE SOUTHWEST.

IN a battle over the Sunday closing proposition, the police at Hutchison, Kans., made eight raids upon the Martin Theater, making in all, fifteen arrests of employes charged with violating the Sunday labor law. E. Wayne Martin, proprietor, put up bonds for his employes. The doors to the operating room were broken by the police. There were four shifts of operators and cashiers ready to work, and as soon as one was arrested another went to work. It is said that the employes were applauded by the crowd for sticking to their posts.

The Nevada National Feature Film Company, which was recently incorporated, has announced that among the early history feature films to be taken, are "Early Days on the Comstock," "The Overland Stage and Pony Express," "General Fremont's Pioneer Trail," "The Donner Party," "Life of Kit Carson," "Mountain Meadow Massacre," "The Truckee-Carson Irrigation Project," and "A Trip Around Tahoe."

An unusual scenic picture, entitled "See Oklahoma City," was taken at Oklahoma City, Okla. Novelty was added and interest in the work increased by a popularity contest, conducted through the local newspapers. The most popular man was privileged to act as escort for the six pretty pilgrims for their trip through the city.

NEW ENGLAND AND CANADA.

MARK SHANE, manager of the Bay State Amusement Company, 181 Tremont Street, Boston, was before Judge Sheehan on August 14, on three charges of larceny, but the charges were dismissed for want of prosecution after Shane had made restitution, with the approval of the court. Sergt. Anderson, of the Lagrange Street police station, testified that Shane inserted advertisements in the papers for men to work in moving picture theaters, promising good wages. A number of boys and men throughout New England answered the advertisements. Anderson testified that after having the recruits under his charge for 10 days, Shane would tell them they were fit to take up jobs at $20 and more per week. The money they left as a deposit of good faith was confiscated, according to Sergt. Anderson, for some alleged breach of the contract, signed at the beginning.

Hoyt's Theater, Norwalk, Conn., re-opened for the season on August 7, with the policy of vaudeville and motion pictures being in force. This house is of the Chris. P. Brown circuit, and the programs will be seen at Danbury, Conn., where Mr. Brown operates a similar house.

At two meetings held in New York last week between committees representing the theatrical managers, and the International Alliance of Theatrical Employees, Mr. Edward Reynolds represented the Boston Local No. 5.

Poli's Theater, Bridgeport, Conn., closed on August 9, up to which time it had been giving a summer season of stock company attractions. This house is due to be "dark" for the next two months, when it will reopen, but with the policy changed to vaudeville and photoplays. Mr. Harry Reinchenbach, who had charge of the house, has had several attractive offers made to him, but he will probably remain under the Poli banner.

The Scenic Temple, Chelsea, Mass., is contemplating forbidding children from eating taffy-on-a-stick during the moving picture show, as a result of an experience last week, when a seven-year-old boy swallowed candy and stick while laughing at a comedy reel.

Thirty-three motion picture theaters and eleven regular houses had their licenses renewed by Supt. John M. Casey at City Hall, Boston, this week. This was done with the approval of Mayor Fitzgerald and Building Commissioner Everett. Seventeen other theaters and eight motion picture theaters will soon have their applications granted, after minor changes have been made.

The new theater at Natick, Mass., is doing so well with its policy of vaudeville and photoplays that it is not at all liable to change to stock company shows, as was originally planned. Mr. Fred L. Harris is president of the corporation owning the new house, and is also the active manager. Eight hundred and twenty-five persons can be seated in the auditorium.

Messrs. Spitz and Nathanson will reopen their Empire Theater, Providence, R. I., on Labor Day, but will try a season of stock company shows.

Another theater to try stock company attractions is the Empire Theater, of Salem, Mass., which will open on August 25, under the direction of Julius Cahn.

The Victoria Theater, of Greenfield, Mass., and the Opera House, Holyoke, Mass., will open August 25 with vaudeville and pictures. Mr. Mike R. Sheedy will generally look after both houses.

The Marcus Loew weekly news films in Boston are being made by Joseph Rottenberg, a former newspaper photographer, who shows considerable knowledge of motion photography, and also displays much acumen in choice of subjects. This local weekly is very popular and growing more so day by day.

Very extensive alterations are now being made in the Washington Theater, Boston, and this house will reopen with a much larger seating capacity than before.

Mr. Harry F. Campbell, for some time assistant manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, has severed his connection with that company, in order to give his entire time to the fast growing Wurner's Features. Mr. Campbell will probably open an office in Boston, from which point he will cover all New England.

Mr. Moxley Blumenberg, owner of the Casco Theater, Portland, Me., is not only a live wire exhibitor, a mighty fine fellow, but among other things is the original licensed exhibitor of Maine, and president of the Maine State Branch of the Exhibitors' League. When Mr. Blumenberg acquired the large Casco Theater, he found that practically every house in Maine, with a seating capacity of over 300, was using vaudeville in connection with the photoplay programs. Mr. Blumenberg announced his intention to show a straight program of quality pictures, only to be greeted with smiles of amusement or pity from his brother exhibitors. It was not long, however, before the eight reels of good licensed service at the Casco were getting the big money, and now a great majority of the houses in Maine are being operated without vaudeville, greatly to the benefit of all concerned. Mr. Blumenberg's house was also the first theater in Maine to run continuous shows and, in many other things, the Casco is a leader. No illustrated songs are used, but the projection is of the star order.

Accompanied by four film experts, to register their activities on motion picture reels, and with a big balloon ascension on the program, the Botson Moving Picture Operators' Union held its yearly outing at Glen Echo Park, Stoughton, Mass., last Sunday. Two special cars were chartered, and the four moving picture cameramen preceded the party in automobiles, taking pictures of the outing crowd on the way down. The start was made in front of the union headquarters at 8:15 a. m., in time to reach the park for dinner. Supper also was served on the grounds, and a large turn-out was there, although the outing was confined to members and invited guests only. Every one voted it one grand, great time.

Mr. Harry Asher, formerly manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, is now general representative in New England for the Famous Players' productions. Mr. Asher has his headquarters at 100 Boylston Street, Boston, and will care for his entire New England business from this point.

Mr. Anthony Stein, until recently booking clerk for the Boston offices of the Mutual Film Corporation, is now installed as assistant manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange.

Mr. Ralph Pinkham, probably as well known as any New England exchange man, severs his connection with the R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, of Boston, to take up the position of booking manager of the Mutual Film Corporation's Boston offices succeeding Mr. Stein.

Mr. "Nate" Brown, manager of the Broadway Theater, Everett, Mass., reopened for the season on August 4, after undergoing a first class painting and renovating job. The Broadway looks very fine indeed, and will no doubt do its usual good business as soon as things get started. The Broadway Theater, Everett, is offering six acts of vaudeville and a large program of pictures, which are changed three times a week.

August 18 sees the reopening of the large Shawmut Theater, Roxbury, Mass. Until Labor Day, the programs will consist of photoplays and songs, but after that the regulation number of vaudeville acts will be introduced. The Shawmut reopens under the ownership of the Beacon Theater Company, and Mr. Jacob Lourie, the general manager, now has another house to direct Licensed pictures which will now be used at the Shawmut. Mr. H. A. Chenoweth remains as resident manager of the house.

The Colonial Theater, Nashua, N. H., reopened on August 18 for the new season, with the regulation programs of vaudeville and pictures that were so popular last season.

The steamer "Connecticut" was burned on August 7 off Governor's Island, near Boston, and moving pictures were made of its destruction, for use in a new film drama. Sightseeing boat trips down the harbor were planned, but the moving picture folks barred spectators from the immediate neighborhood of the ship while the pictures were being taken. Some especially fine pictures were secured.

Mr. Charles W. Dorr, part owner of the Gem Theater, Winthrop, Mass., reports big business as a general thing. The Gem is mighty well managed, and also has the benefit of being well advertised. Mr. Dorr gets out a weekly program that has many good points to it.

The Grand Theater, Bellows Falls, Vt., has been secured on lease by Mr. H. DeMotte Perry. The Grand is one of the most modern of all Vermont photoplay theaters, and has a seating capacity of about 900 persons. Mr. Perry will open the place on Labor Day, when a quality program of moving pictures will be offered. Vaudeville may be made a part of the programs, but this is not yet decided on.

Moosehead Lake, Me., was honored by a two weeks' visit by George Balsdon, head of the poster department of the General Film Company. Mr. Balsdon, and his wife and daughter are all ardent open air devotees. A branch of the poster department of the General Film Company is scheduled for Bangor, Me., and Mr. Balsdon spent some time looking over the situation in this Maine city. An office will shortly be opened there.

J. C. Rathbone, the man behind the Opera House, Exeter, N. H., is a busy man these days, as he is continually thinking up new stunts and ideas to keep business up to the mark.

Lawler Brothers, who operate the Lawler Theater, in Greenfield, Mass., are giving a mixed policy, consisting of legitimate attractions the first part of the week, and vaudeville and picture shows the latter part of each week. Business is reported as being very satisfactory.

Messrs. Streeter and McCarthy, who run the Victoria Theater, at Greenfield, Mass., are doing very well with vaudeville and pictures. Last week, a patriotic reunion was held at this house, with "The Re-union at Gettysburg" being the feature attraction.

Mr. W. A. Weseley (Weseley says so) opened his theater at Greenfield, Mass., on August 1, and says that business is good, with bills of photoplays and songs. The Weseley Theater has the individuality of its owner stamped over it, which helps business greatly.

Mr. A. A. Kellemann reopened his Park Theater, Taunton, Mass., to the public on August 4, and has been doing a capacity business. A large program of vaudeville and feature pictures is turning the trick for the Park.

August 18 saw the opening of the Bijou Theater, Woonsocket, R. I., with a large program of pictures and illustrated songs.

Mr. Guy Ramsey, treasurer of the Opera House at St. John's N. B., was married last month to Miss Gladys Boyer. The many friends of Mr. Ramsey are extending hearty congratulations.

One of the four new companies opening the season with George Kleine's "Quo Vadis?" pictures will be stationed at the Park Theater, of Bridgeport, Conn. This company will tour New England and the Eastern States, and is in charge of Messrs. Sam Mott and Edward Lester.

Mr. H. M. Goodhue finds business very good at Hacker's Theater, Fort Fairfield, Me., of which he is manager. Mr. Goodhue sprang a real sensation when he offered a whole week of Kinemacolor service exclusively. The natural color pictures of the Durbar and the Panama Canal were exhibited, in addition to many others, of travel scenes, fashions, etc.

Mr. Sidney Toler was presented with a beautiful silver loving cup from his associates in Keith's Theater, Portland, Me., as a token of esteem and appreciation for his friendship during his several seasons there.

Work has been started on the new Alcazar Theater, Grandview, Canada. Miss Maude Leone, of the Empress Theater, Vancouver, Canada, turned up the first spadeful of ground. Considerable formality was observed in the ground breaking, and speeches were made. The Alcazar is promised to be a very fine and expensive theater to play vaudeville and pictures.

The Court Square Theater, Springfield, Mass., offered the "Quo Vadis?" reels for the week of August 11, and business was big. "Quo Vadis?" has done a good business wherever exhibited in New England, and this masterpiece is slated to be exhibited in a large number of cities hereabouts.

The Reel is the name of a new photoplay theater now nearly finished in Springfield, Mass. The Reel has a good location on Main Street, and should get its share of the available trade, provided the programs are good.

Mr. F. J. Carroll, manager of the Merrimack Square Theater, Lowell, Mass., has decided to run stock company shows until further notice. Last season this house offered vaudeville and pictures.

The Premier Theater, Lowell, Mass., reports good business since it opened for the new season on August 2. A good program of photoplays is given at this house.

Mr. J. Fred Lovett, manager of the Broadway Theater, Lawrence, Mass., is doing very well indeed with his new house.

Mr. A. Benjamin, manager of the Scenic Temple, Haverhill, Mass., is doing nicely with his picture programs. Just to start a little excitement, Mr. Benjamin has installed a gigantic Wurlitzer automatic orchestra, the only one in the city. The Wurlitzer has jumped into immediate popularity, and Mr. Benjamin rejoices.

Mr. Moxley Blumenberg, president of the Maine State Branch No. 29, reports that his organization is doing very well, and that the list of members is increasing somewhat slowly, but steadily. The next formal meeting is called for Bangor, Me., to be held just after Labor Day. A letter has been sent out to each member, of which there are about thirty, urging them to be sure to bring non-members with them to the Bangor meeting. All non-members have been written of the importance of quickly joining the organization and asking them to come to Bangor without fail. Considerable interest is manifested by Maine exhibitors in the branch and a very well attended meeting is sure to be held at Bangor.

At a recent meeting of the Massachusetts State Branch of the Exhibitors' League, the resignation of Mr. Joseph Mack from the presidency was accepted, and Mr. Ernest Horstmann was elected to succeed to the office. At a meeting held shortly after this, quite a few new members were taken in, and the branch is again very much alive in Massachuetts. A special meeting was held this week, at which members of the seceded States were present, to tell their side of the fracas. Mr. Neff was expected to be present to explain his side of the story, but was unable to come to Boston. On this account no action was taken, except to call a meeting for Friday, August 25, at which this State branch is to reorganize and decide on which side of the fence it will go, or whether to remain independent of both.

Contrary to some reports, the new Keith Theater, St. John, Canada, is not for sale. Mr. A. E. Willis, manager for the contractor, H. L. Brown, of Philadelphia, and A. E. Westover, the architect, have settled their claim, receiving a full discharge. Mr. E. F. Albee, talking for Keith and Albee, stated that there were no unpaid bills, and that everything was satisfactory.

Manager Cortlandt Baker, of the Garden Theater, of Waterbury, Conn., exhibited the "Battle of Gettysburg" reels last week and found business brisk.

Manager Sheehan, of the Colonial Theater, Waterbury, Conn., a photoplay house, is again on the job after having been laid up for some little time.

Jacques' Theater, Waterbury, Conn., will reopen on August 18, but under the management of Poli & Parsons. For the present, a stock company is installed, but vaudeville and photoplays may succeed the stock.

The new Empire Theater, Oak and Congress Streets, Portland, Maine, is now well along, and the work is being pushed ahead as rapidly as possible. The house hay be ready by September.

THE YOUNGER GENERATION (Sept. 1).—When Michael Riley, a poor laborer, unexpectedly fell heir to two thousand dollars, he did not spend it in riotous living. Instead, he decided to use it to give his daughter, Maggie, an education. So Maggie was packed off to a fashionable boarding school while her heartbroken mother wept, and her father puffed at his empty pipe. Maggie was a charming young girl, so John Boyd fell in love with her. He was the son of the mayor of the town where Maggie went to school. He was a rich young man, an influential young man, and withal, a nice young man. So the principal of the school had no hesitation in asking him to give away the diplomas on Commencement Day.

Afterwards, at the Commencement Dance, he asked her to marry him. Maggie was on the point of accepting him, when suddenly she remembered. Who was she that she should marry this young aristocrat? She temporized and bade him come to her home for his final answer.

Boyd came to the Riley home and met Maggie's uncouth parents. The rude surroundings and the reek of the father's pipe were too much for him, and he turned away disillusioned. As he walked down the street, however, he suddenly realized that all the joy and happiness were going out of his life forever, and so he turned back and told Maggie that she was the only person who had ever really mattered anyway.

THE GRECIAN VASE (Sept. 2).—In the window of an antique shop there once stood a Greek vase which meant more to Giulio, a poor sculptor, who lived nearby, than anything else in the world. On the vase was the figure of a woman skillfully executed. Giulio was in love with the vase and in love with the woman upon it.

One day an unusually stringent state of finances forced Giulio to take a little statue on which he had devoted many hours of careful labor to the antique shop in the hope of selling it. Inside the shop he paused to pay his daily tribute of admiration to the vase. As he turned away, the end of the statue which he carried hit the vase and knocked it to the floor, where it shattered into a thousand pieces. The indignant clerk, discovering that Giulio was penniless, insisted on taking the statue in return for the broken vase. Giulio took the broken pieces and went sadly back to his attic.

On one little fragment of the vase the face of the woman was still preserved in all its former beauty. Guilio gazed on it yearningly and fell into a deep reverie. He saw the woman of the vase in the midst of a laughing throng of dancing dryads, and followed her over hill and dale while the mystic pipes of Pan filled the air with a music as intoxicating as old wine.

The dream was the turning point of Giulio's fortunes, for he awoke from it to find a letter from the manager of the antique shop, informing him that his statue was worth many times the value of the broken vase. Moreover, so strongly did the vision affect Giulio that he wrought, in living marble, a statue of the dream woman that made him famous.

THE GIRL, THE CLOWN AND THE DONKEY (Sept. 3).—Joey's heart was probably not breaking while he made grimaces and played antics before the crowd in the big tent, but it is quite certain that he was not nearly as cheerful as he pretended to be. For Joey, the clown, was not popular in the circus company. In the whole company there were only two who did not kick and curse him. One was Dynamite, his pet mule, and the other was Margaret Jones, otherwise known as Margarita, the daring equestrienne.

Suddenly the astonished circus learned that Joey had fallen heir to his uncle's fortune. The despised clown became at once the cynosure of all eyes. Then, while he was still dazed by his unexpected popularity, a telegram came from the attorney saying that the fortune amounted to the princely sum of thirty-four dollars.

The storm of disappointed rage which followed the receipt of this news on the part of Joey's new host of friends may be imagined. Only Margarita remained unchanged — Margarita and Dynamite. With a woman's prudence, she went to the telegraph office to discover if there could be a mistake. Sure enough, the telegram should have read, "thirty-four thousand," instead of "thirty-four." With this joyful news she hurried back to the circus and discovered the gentle Joey, infuriated for the first time in his life, engaged in literally beating the life out of a man who had dared to kick his mule. Joey, Margarita and Dynamite left the circus that very day and have lived happily ever since.

A SERIES OF TALLULAH FALLS, GEORGIA (Sept. 3).—Showing scenes about the well known Georgia summer resort, which is rich in numberless Indian traditions. It is a beautiful gorge, down which the waters from the Blue Ridge Mountains rush for 550 feet.

THE AWAKENING OF THE MAN (Special—2 parts—Sept. 5).—Things are going none too well for the firm of Wentworth & Sons. The volume of business is steadily decreasing, and importunate creditors make things highly unpleasant for Richard, the reckless fellow who has taken his late father's place. As a final drop in the cup of bitterness, a terrible fire destroys the warehouses, rendering them a total loss.

Richard breaks down and asks his fiancée's father for help. During their conference, the girl comes in unnoticed, and shocked by the disclosure of Richard's weakness, gives him back his ring. That night, in a fit of dejection, Richard decides to end his troubles with a revolver. In the very shadow of death, his eye falls on the picture of the grim old Puritan which hangs among the family portraits. As he looks, the picture fades away. In its place is a log cabin, hotly besieged by savages. The doorbolt falls, shattered to the floor under the stress of the blows without, and the Puritan thrusts his arm into its place, and, despite the fearful agony, holds the door until help arrives.

Richard draws his hand across his brow, and reaches for a decanter. As he does so, his glance shifts to another picture, which, in its turn, fades A dispatch rider, after a perilous ride through the British lines, delivers his message to Washington, and falls senseless to the ground.

The lines about Richard's mouth grow harder. He sets the liquor aside, takes a cigar from the box nearby, and looks at the portraits of his father and grandfather. The pictures fade, and Richard looks upon the moments in their lives when everything seemed dark and blackened by the hand of fate. He sees how these strong, clean-hearted men met their troubles squarely, face-to-face, and how they fought and conquered the evil fates opposing them.

For a long time the boy sits in thought. At last he rises, with a new, strong look on his face. The disheartened old family servant starts back in joyful wonder as Richard Wentworth, erect and fearless in his newly-found manhood passes him and goes forth to fight his good fight and win back the love of the girl he has lost.

SLANDER'S TONGUE (Sept. 6).—Sue Grant was in love with Jim, and she didn't care who knew it. When Clarence Bell tried to hold her hand at the village store, she got very angry with him and was glad when Jim pushed him away from her. This disdainful treatment of her son did not please Mrs. Bell in the least.

Sue's Uncle Joe invited her to spend a fortnight in the city with his family. Sue, glad of a chance to see the sights, gaily trotted off and had a splended time. As she waited at the junction for the train which was to carry her bac kto her home, her attention was suddenly attracted by a small child calmly sitting in the middle of the track. The whistle sounded and the train burst into view around the bend. She sprang on the track, seized the child and rolled safely out of the way as the heavy locomotive thundered past.

Mrs. Searle, the child's mother, who had been engaged in a conversation with the station agent, was almost embarrassingly grateful. She took the girl home with her and insisted on giving her a beautiful new dress to replace the old one, which had been sadly soiled and torn in the adventure. Later, she sent Sue all the way home in her automobile.

Sue's arrival created an enormous sensation. Everybody knew that her Uncle Joe was poor. Where, then, did she get the clothes? And who furnished the automobile? Mrs. Bell, as may be imagined, was by no means behindhand in circulating spicy rumors. The girl's explanation was received either with suppressed smiles or open scorn. Joe, although he, of course, believed her story, did not like the new clothes and said so.

Angered by his attitude and infuriated by the village gossip, Sue accepted an invitation from a scamp named Harry Pearsall, to go out riding in his new car. Harry, who had drawn his own conclusions from the gossip, took her out to a wayside inn, bought wine for her and attempted to kiss her.

Fortunately for Sue's reputation, help was near at hand. The grateful Mrs. Searle, who had come to thank Sue again, recognized her on the road and brought Sue's mother and Jim to the inn. Everything was explained and everybody was happy, except Harry.

KALEM.

THE CHRISTIAN (Sept. 1).—When Christian, a city toiler, receives a letter from his dying mother requesting him to be just and righteous and lift up the fallen and help the weak, he ponders long. His mother—his sainted mother—is dying. The youth leaves his humble room and despondently departs for the water front. As he approaches he sees the figure of a woman kneeling in supplication. Something tragic in her appearance holds him spellbound. Suddenly she arises. It is a young girl. As she is about to plunge into the seething waters below Christian darts forward and saves—Esther, a city unfortunate. The beautiful girl sobs out her pitiful story. She has no home; she is scorned and shunned. Christian takes her to his humble room. She slumbers locked securely in the room while he rests outside the door, his head pillowed on his coat.

In the morning they are driven from the house. Christian swears to protect this girl. They start into the country as brother and sister. A farmer gives them refreshment. They tarry. Esther helps about the house while the sturdier Christian works in the fields. He is startled when he finds his love for the girl is not that of a brother's and realizes that she is the only woman in the world. Then comes the shock. Fate throws Worldly, a city idler, their way. He is injured and Esther recognizes him. As she tenderly nurses him back to health Worldly realizes his great love for the girl. He soon recovers and they are wed.

As they leave, Christian wearily trudges toward the house. The farmer and his wife follow and enter softly. Christian leans forward, his head resting on his arm, and his mother's letter in his hand. They gently raise him. Christian is dead.

THE SACRIFICE AT THE SPILLWAY (Special—2 parts—Sept. 3).—Curtis, the overbearing captain of a canal boat, tires of his sweetheart, Martha, and forces his attentions on Sal. Sal, however, has given her heart to Bob, one of the loaders, who incurs the enmity of the captain. The two men have an encounter which leads to the dismissal of Curtis and Bob becomes captain.

Dick and Madge, two youngsters who aspire to become detectives, discover that Curtis is plotting Bob's undoing. They inform Martha, who promises to assist them in protecting the new captain.

The plane house, containing the mechanism controlling a cable in the canal, is situated at the top of the spillway, through which the overflow from the flume rushes in a miniature Niagara. Curtis overpowers Ryan, the plane tender, and pulls the lever which will wreck Bob's boat. Sal interferes, but not in time to save Bob from being injured. Bob manages to make his way to the plane house and is attacked by Curtis, who forces him toward the rushing waters.

At that moment Martha arrives with a rifle at the foot of the spillway. She knows that she cannot prevent one of the men from being killed, and determines to sacrifice Curtis, that Sal may be happy with Boh. Martha fires and Curtis, falling into the cataract, pays the penalty.

BOGGS' PREDICAMENT (Sept. 5).—The doctor informs Boggs, a wealthy bachelor, that he must keep his injured foot at an elevation and a tiresome task is imposed upon the bachelor's valet. The servant finds his duty particularly distressing because he has made a date with his girl, and is obliged to spend the evening holding his master's foot in the air. The valet has a great idea. With a piece of wire he suspends Boggs' foot when the bachelor falls asleep and hastens away to join the girl.

"Second Story Ike," a sneak thief, enters Boggs' apartment and finds the job of robbing the house an easy one. In endeavoring to drive away the thief Boggs breaks the bed and is in an awful plight.

Needless to say, the valet has a day of reckoning when he finally gets home.

CHILDREN OF THE TENEMENTS (Sept. 5).—Through lack of sufficient playgrounds, 26,000 children are forced to play in the streets of New York's tenement district. This interesting picture portrays the manner in which they find amusement. We see the annual May Party in Central Park; the outing clubs formed by the Fresh Air missions; a little mothers' meeting under Brooklyn Bridge; a juvenile suffragette club; odd playhouses and many other forms of entertainment.

THE HAND OF DESTINY (Sept. 6).—Mr. and Mrs. Williams send their five-year-old daughter, Mary, to visit an aunt. Some days later Williams has trouble and is discharged from the railroad service. Unable to secure work, he gets into bad company and Buck Harris, a gang leader, proposes that they secure the fifty thousand dollars which is being shipped on train No. 7. Williams struggles with his conscience and finally agrees to join the rogues. They draw lots and it falls to Williams to set off a charge of dynamite which will wreck the train.

It happens that little Mary becomes homesick and the aunt sends her back on No. 7. Unmindful of the fact that his child is on the train, Williams crouches, with his companions, near the trestle, prepared to set off the dynamite. Several unusual occurrences delay the train. Finally the desperadoes have an argument and Williams flatly refuses to take part in the affair. Buck sees that the train is rounding the curve and demands, with a revolver, that Williams fulfill his agreement. A deadly encounter takes place and the train dashes by in safety.

When Williams reaches home, determined to lead an honest life, he is surprised to find his little daughter telling the mother of her visit. "I was perfectly safe all the way, mother," the little one is saying.

LUBIN.

A MOUNTAIN MOTHER (Sept. 1).—Up on the mountain, Liza, the widow, lives with her daughter, Lilly. Liza's big purpose in life is to secure an education for Lilly and to make a "lady" of her. With this end in view the widow toils every day on her small farm and once a week drives into town to sell her eggs and chickens. Jed Dowling, a big, rough mountaineer about the age of the widow, wants Lilly for his wife. The widow herself wants to marry Jed, but she puts him off until after she has sent Lilly to school.

To the mountain comes Walter, who writes poems and stories. He seeks inspiration and finds it in Lilly. Liza later takes him in as a boarder. When he proposes marriage to Lilly the widow sees in him the means of assuring her daughter the life of a "lady," but insists that they be married before going to Walter's home in the big city. Liza now considers herself free to marry Jed. As the young people are going down the mountain, some revenue officers raid a moonshine still. Jed, who is one of the moonshiners, escapes. Finding Walter in the vicinity, he immediately jumps at the conclusion that he is a spy and brought the officers down on them. He tries to kill Walter. There is a struggle for the gun, Lilly, meanwhile, running back to tell her mother that Jed is killing Walter.

When Liza arrives in sight of the struggling men, Jed has Walter helpless and is about to kill him. Liza cannot get to Jed in time to stop him. She sees her daughter's chance of happiness about to be shattered. It is a choice between her own future and her daughter's. Liza raises her long rifle and shoots Jed.

THE ENGAGING KID (Sept. 2).—George Castle, while spending a vacation at the seashore, becmoes engaged to four girls. Three are merely summer engagements, but Frankie Somers is the real thing. The other three girls, feeling themselves trifled, threaten suit, and George finds himself in a bad fix. He appeals to his mother, who is an actress, for help. Mrs. Castle then makes herself up as an impossible old woman and assumes the air of a virago. She interviews the fair plaintiffs, and the idea of this horrible old woman for a mother-in-law quickly changes their views. Nell, Violet and Margie are convinced that they have escaped a terrible fate and are perfectly willing to let anybody else have George who is willing to take mamma in the deal. They call the engagements off and Mrs. Castle dolls up, quickly, sets things right with the girl that her boy really loves and recites the usual benediction.

TRIMMING A BOOB (Sept. 2).—Bob Green, a hayseed, leaves his happy country home and goes to the city with a moderate size bank roll, figuring to double it by some wise investment. He meets a sport who lures him into a gambling room, telling him how easy it is to make money when he has a little pile to back him. Bob flirts with the green cloth, and just as he has lost his last dollar the police raid the joint. A stampede takes place, but the gamblers find all exits blocked. Bob tries the roof, but is too fat to squeeze through the scuttle. He sits at the top of the ladder, entirely blocking the exit. The gamblers also resolve to try the roof and command Bob to make way, but he refuses until they have disgorged not only the money they have taken from him, but also the capital of the bank. The rush breaks down the doorposts and Bob follows the others with his bank roll more than doubled. Feeling satisfied, he returns to his peaceful village home.

THE ROAD TO THE DAWN (Special—2 parts—Sept. 4).—In a New England village lives Bill Hedrick, the town drunkard. Bill works only enough to procure the four dollars to pay for the jug of liquor which is expressed to him, C. O. D. In the city from which the liquor is shipped, Mary Lane, a widow, still young, but broken by privation, realizing that her end is near, takes her little girl, Daisy, to the express office, consigns her to a close relative and goes quickly away. In a little bag about the child's neck she has placed a little ring, hand-made from a gold coin, and has told the child to allow no one to touch it. At the railway station the tag hastily tied to Daisy's arm comes off, as does that on Bill's jug. The agent, in replacing the tags, switches them, so that in due time Daisy arrives at Bill's address, with $4 charges. Bill attempts to refuse the consignment, but the local agent, not knowing what else to do with the child, bullies Bill into paying the C. O. D. Bill takes the child to his shack and puts her to bed. He discovers the little bag, and by its feel can tell that it contains a ring, but as the child begs that it be let alone, he does not press his investigation. The child falls asleep and Bill, tormented by thirst, wanders about, finally sitting down and watching the child. Her sweetness and innocence stirs memories the he had thought were long ago drowned in drink. The scene dissolves, and the Bill Hedricks of the other days is seen, a handsome young country blacksmith, happy with his sweetheart, Mary. He has hammered from a gold piece a quaint little ring, which he gives her. Their lives seem to promise sunshine, until Bill for the first time shows the effect of drink. A stranger from the city appears, and pays Mary ardent court. Bill takes Mary to a barn dance; he freely samples the hard cider and is soon helplessly drunk. Mary allows the stranger to escort her home and Bill never sees her again. Bill becomes a common drunkard. The scene dissolves and Bill is again seated beside the child. The next day is one of torment to Bill; his craving for liquor making each moment an agony. A whiskey peddler produces a flask and asks Bill if he wishes to buy. Bill has not a cent. The peddler asks if he has not a watch, a ring. Bill remembers the bag about the child's neck; he enters the shack and removes the bag from the neck of the sleeping baby and takes out the ring to recognize it as the one he made for and placed upon the hand of his sweetheart. Under the shock of realization that the sweetheart of his youth was this child's mother, Bill staggers, then suddenly realizes to what depths he has fallen, to steal from a sleeping baby the means to buy the liquor that has blasted two lives. He drives the peddler from the place, gathers the child up and hurries out into the world, taking a road that will lead to better days.

On the advice of a physician he sells his fruitstand and goes south with his daughter, Bettina. There she wins the attention of Bradley, a small town usurer. When Giacinta needs money for land, he has to go to Bradley. Vincente, a young Italian, helps them work their farm. Bradley, fearing Vincente's influence over Bettina, endeavors to have Giacinta discharge him, but is unsuccessful. The crop is a big success and Bradley, foreseeing the payment of the mortgage will break his hold on Bettina, induces Pepo, Vincente's rival, to steal the money. Pepo does so, hides most of the money behind an old stump on an uncleared land. He gambles with the rest of the money and is killed, but does not die until he has accused Bradley and betrayed the hiding place of the money to Vincente. Bradley, hoping to foreclose the mortgage before the money can be found, proceeds to Giacinta's house, accompanied by a sheriff, but before the sheriff can take possession, Vincente arrives with the money, having found it in the place indicated by Pepo, and saves the day.

IN THE TOILS (Sept. 6).—Winn Hardy is coaxed to lend his name as an aid to a bogus land scheme through the efforts of an adventuress, Edith Warrington, with whom he is infatuated. He goes to the country to sell the stock to farmers, and there saves Mona Denton from drowning in the river. Mona's father is the owner of the village store, and he is only too glad to believe in Winn's proposition, and despite the efforts of Sam, Mona's sweetheart, to blacken the city man's character, he gets his farmer friends to join him in buying up the stock. Winn has won the love of Mona and they become engaged. About this time Winn gets word that the company has failed and all the farmers' money lost. Winn now realizes he has been duped, and tells the farmers he is going back to the city to make good, return and pay them all back. They laugh at him and Mona is the only one that has any faith in him. Winn returns to the city, and after a long, hard struggle, strikes it rich. He sends Mona's father a check to cover all the money he and his friends paid in, and then leaves by motorboat to see Mona. The boat is wrecked when the engine explodes, and when the villagers discover who it is that is in danger of being drowned, they refuse to go to his assistance. Mona finally gets Sam to go to the rescue and he brings the unconscious man ashore, where Mona lovingly brings him back to consciousness. Meanwhile Mona's father has read the delayed letter and hastens out to tell his friends the money has been returned. He comes upon them just after the rescue and everything ends happily for all.

THE PASSING OF JOE MARY (Sept. 1).—When a murdered prospector is brought into the fort Colonel Murphy orders Sergeant Winslow to go in search of the murderer. In the company of a trooper, Winslow starts out and it is not long before the men are on the murderer's trail. Joe Mary, the pursued man, espies them coming and from a place of vantage he shoots and kills the horses of both men; also the trooper. Winslow's canteen is punctured by Joe in the desert, and, unable to stand the thirst any longer, he falls in an exhausted condition upon the sand. Perceiving that Winslow is not feigning exhaustion, Joe goes to him and tantalizes him by repeated offers of his canteen of water. In desperation he begs Joe to kill him and just as he has raised his rifle, Winslow, who is a ventriloquist, utters a peculiar sound, which seems to have come from behind Joe, who, in turning around, is killed by Winslow. At the fort Winslow is received with homage.

HIS LORDSHIP—BILLY SMOKE (Sept. 2).—The illusion of Billy Smoke, a cowboy, of having a good time in guiding Lord Fitznoodle and his valet to the former's mine, is soon dispelled after he meets the gentlemen on the station. Billy soon finds himself laden with the luggage of the lord, and even when they reach the trail, Billy is subjected to meanness. The lord's "junk" is taken from the back of Billy and placed upon the back of his horse. The lord and his valet ride on while Billy walks. The lord will not even permit Billy to eat at the same time that he eats. Billy's patience comes to an end when the lord asks him to prepare his morning bath. Instead of doing as he is told, Billy gives his lordship an impromptu bath, and, at the point of a revolver, takes his clothes, goes to the mine and presents himself as Lord Fitznoodle. He raises the salaries of all the men and fires the superintendent for trying to kiss the stenographer. When the lord appears Billy has him arrested for being an imposter. Billy marries the stenographer and the situation is made clear to everyone by the reading of a letter from Billy found on the table after his departure that the imprisoned man is the real lord after all.

THE KISS OF RETRIBUTION (Sept. 3).—After bidding a fond farewell to his sweetheart, Edgar Forrest leaves for the city on business. At the hotel he is stopping at he meets an adventuress, Zoie la Fevre, who falls madly in love with him. Each time he attempts to leave, the adventuress brings into play all the wiles of her scheming nature and Edgar prolongs his stay. Time after time he has visions of his sweetheart, but the lure of the adventuress proves stronger and he stays. At length he makes up his mind to go and tell Zoie of his determinate action. Zoie pleads for a kiss before he goes; Edgar consents. Before Edgar arrives, however, the adventuress swallows poison, and putting a little of it on her lips, lets Edgar kiss them. Zoie dies before Edgar can release his embrace, and a few moments later the young man, who has become infected with the poison from the lips of the adventuress, falls dead upon the lifeless body of Zoie.

THE LONELY PRINCESS (Sept. 4).—The daughter of Prince Rafaello, an impoverished nobleman, is growing tired of life on account of her lonely existence. One day a young American millionaire, named Endicott, spending a part of his vacation in Venice, passes her in a gondola as she is sitting on the balcony of her beautiful residence. He falls in love with her and that night returns and serenades her. She throws him a rose and Endicott, after making inquiries as to whom she is, starts out for Rome to locate her father. A few days later the princess receives a letter from her father saying that he is returning with a young American millionaire whom he wishes her to marry. The princess is heartbroken, not knowing who he is; but her sadness is soon transformed into joy when her father returns with the man who had serenaded her.

WHEN WOMEN GO ON THE WARPATH (Special—2 parts—Sept. 6).—After the great suffrage parade in Jonesville, Deacon Josiah Pitts goes for a walk along the river bank. Seeing some boys in swimming, he decides to do likewise, but has his clothes stolen. It is a very embarrassing position for him as he is leader of the "dry" party in the town, and if the other men ever heard of it he would be laughed to death. He is helped out of his trouble by Tom Arnold, who gets his clothes back for him.

Tom is in love with Isobel Martin, who tells him that she will not marry him until Jonesville goes "dry." By way of helping on the good cause, Tom suggests that the women "corner" all the pants in town and that, on the night before the election, they shall "swipe" their husbands' nether garments. His plan is carried out successfully and the cellar of the suffrage club is filled with pants of all kinds before the dawn of the eventful day breaks.

Election morning and not a man has a pair of pants, with the exception of the election officers. How on earth are they going to vote? It certainly is a puzzle. Phone calls to the stores reveal the fact that all the pants in town have been bought out. There are no trousers to be had for love nor money.

Some of the men go out without them, wearing petticoats, bath robes and such like, and succeed, not in voting, but in getting arrested. A few of them catch the deacon on his way to the polls, and take his pants. While trying to get away from sight the poor man falls into a horsetrough and gets soaked through. He goes to a drug store and asks for something to warm him. The druggist, who is serving behind the counter in his wife's kimono, giving him whiskey and making him gloriously drunk. When at last, dressed in a petticoat, he gets to the voting booth he votes "wet."

As far as the "dry" party is concerned, the election is a success—the "wets" simply are not in it. Tom gets his heart's desire when Isobel promises to be his bride, while the men of the town have a busy time trying to get hold of suitable pants. The election over, there are "pants, pants, everywhere, but not a pant that fits."

A DOLL FOR THE BABY (August 26).—A pretty story of the devotion of a bunch of cowboys to the rancher's baby daughter is told. The rancher and his wife forget to bring home a doll for the baby, who they find sick when they return from town. The child is heartbroken at not having the toy and the doctor fears that unless it can be obtained for her within a few hours her life cannot be saved. At great risk to life and limb, for the intervening country is rough and filled with hostile Indians, the STONE THE WOMAN (September 2).—Draw back your skirts, oh maiden pure and fair, lest they perchance may touch her garments as she passes. Shun her as you would a vile reptile or a fell disease that pollutes the air. Give her no word or look that would bespeak the sympathy of humanity.

Put forth a willing hand to clasp His—the hand that led her to destruction and disgrace. Shower upon him the smiles—the same tender graces and the same love that she saw fit to honor him with.

Pass her, oh maiden, with a pure proud face, if she puts out a poor polluted palm. Ignore in silent contempt the piteous specimen of womanhood as she passes, beseeching one little token of womanly recognition.

But—lay your hand in his on bridal day, the man who brought her there, and swear to cling to him. Stone the woman—let the man go free?

MR. DIPPY DIPPED (Sept. 3).—Mr. Dippy and his daughter Ruth are both very fond of the water and spend a good deal of time at the beach. Ruth meets and falls in love with the handsome lifesaver, and he falls an easy victim of her charms. Father Dippy also succumbs to cupid's arrow and becomes madly infatuated with Miss Fascination. When father sees Ruth and the life-saver together he flies into a rage and takes her home. A day or two later Mr. Dippy and Ruth are again at the beach. Mr. Dippy sees Miss Fascination and she takes him canoeing. The canoe is overturned and Mr. Dippy, who is unable to swim, calls for help. Mr. Life Guard and Ruth go to his assistance. The novel way in which the pair force him to consent to their marriage is extremely funny.

HARD LUCK BILL (Sept. 4).—Bill Jones is in arrears with Mrs. Swatt, his landlady and she tells him to produce the money or leave. He borrows ten dollars from his next door neighbor, Tom. Bill sees the landlady enter with a stunning looking girl and in order to make a hit helps himself to Tom's new suit of clothes. He manages to meet the young lady as she is leaving the house and invites her to luncheon. When he comes to pay for it, he discovers that he left the money in his own pockets. In the meantime, Mrs. Swatt, in a rage at not receiving her rent, throws Bill's clothes out the window and they are picked up by a tramp. Bill comes back for the money, finds his clothes gone and the landlady hales him to the police station. The girl is also taken to the station and a general mixup ensues, which is settled by the appearance on the scene of the tramp with Bill's clothes and the ten-dollar bill.

WHILE THE STARLIGHT TRAVELS (Special—2 parts—Sept. 5).—Before history was written in America, Tulon, a stalwart young warrior of the Cliff Dwellers, captured from another tribe, a beautiful maiden, Walla. Her pleas failing to move him, she submitted to captivity stoically, prophesying, "The time will come when you will beg mercy of me. May our God then protect you, for I shall then be pitiless." Apparently she was a false prophet, for love soon took the place of hatred and, over sacred fire, they vowed eternal devotion.

During the Civil War, Ida, a beautiful Southern girl, was startled one evening by the sudden entrance into her house of Eric, a Northern spy. At the instant of their meeting, a mysterious attraction springs to life, to which they both nearly yield. Ida has the impression of having known him before, but in spite of her feelings, gives him mercilessly to die. Then the gate of the past opens for her, and she realized that the spy is her lover of ages past. Desperate at having given him to death, she hastens to rectify her error, and in a cryptic message given to Eric in a Bible, she prepares him for his escape that night. After Lee surrendered, we last see them living again the love of the past and gazing at the starlight which began its journey in the far-off days when they first loved.

BRONCHO BILLY'S CONSCIENCE (Sept. 6).—Broncho Billy, foreman, finds Tom Warner has squatted on a section of Stockdale's ranch. He complains to the owner, who tells him to oust Warner. The squatter, however, refuses to go. Marguerite, the ranch owner's daughter, while on a shopping trip to town, has trouble with her saddle. Warner goes to her assistance and man and girl immediately fall in love with each other. Warner meets the girl again, but Broncho Billy (who is also in love with Marguerite), and the father, on finding the pair together, are furious. Father orders the daughter home and tells Warner never to speak to the girl again. Shortly afterward, the ranch owner is shot. Broncho Billy, to get even with Warner, secretly arranges things so that his rival is accused and finally hanged on circumstantial evidence. The following fall, Broncho Billy proposes to Marguerite, but visions of the dead man haunt him, and in trying to get away from them, he backs out of an opening in a barn loft and is killed.

MELIES.

LOST IN CAMBODIA (August 28).—Aunt Mary and her two nephews, Ferdinand and Paul, leave the ruins of Angkor for the capital of Cambodia, Phnom Penh. They experience a pleasant (?) journey on the native bullock carts, and spend five days aboard "sampans," the native boats, to reach that destination. At Phnom Penh the royal dancing girls perform for them. Later they visit the zoo, but Aunt Mary is so "fussy" that Ferdinand takes it into his head to "bolt" the party. His aunt is panic-stricken and hires Mr. I. Fearnothing, the famous detective, to find him. They take up the trail, but are interrupted in the search by a great procession, the annual fete of parading Buddha about the city. They meet a personage of dark skin, supposedly of royal birth, who gives them a clew. The royal personage's clews get the party into many embarrassing and humiliating predicaments.

At the end of a week Ferdinand is still missing, and Aunt Mary gets word to return at once. She boards a steamer. The royal one follows. At sea she still bemoans the loss of her nephew, when he of the royal dress greets her, wipes the black from his face and proves to be—Ferdinand.

BIOGRAPH.

A WOMAN IN THE ULTIMATE (Sept. 4).—The unwilling dupe of her step-father, she became the decoy of the wealthy young man, but at the crucial moment she saved both herself and the young man and thus ended the game of the badgers.

THE STRONG MAN'S BURDEN (Sept. 6).—Her mother heart leans to her weak son, and dying, she asks the other to bring him to her. On the lookout for the thief, he comes face to face with his brother. At a fearful cost to himself, he sends the brother back to the mother and learns thereby the strong must bear the burden of the weak.

THE CROOK AND THE GIRL (August 25).—In the guise of a gardener he came to steal the paper telling the whereabouts of the second will. That was so the nephew might enjoy the inheritance alone. Then the girl learned his true mission, but in the end he restored her confidence and beat her enemies at their own game.

THE ADOPTED BROTHER (August 30).—He saw another accused of a crime his degenerate brother had committed. He stood by truth. Two escaped convicts, filled with vengeance, sought the adopted brother. Good done another and returned, frustrated their evil design, though the price was a life.

is released. They threaten to kill the physician if the Caid is not released in three days. While the physician is awaiting death, one of the chief's daughters is bitten by a snake and the physician succeeds in curing her. Soon thereafter the physiiccian escapes through the aid of the chief and his daughter and on reaching civilization, has a vision of his rescuer being in trouble. He secures the release of the Caid from the French authorities and arrives at the Arab camp just in time to rescue his rescuer.

$1,000 REWARD (August 27).—Tom Fitzsimmons is discharged from the ranch where, as a cowboy, he has the nerve to propose to the ranch owner's daughter. Disheartened, Tom seeks what solace he can find in the nearby booze emporium, and there, in a penny dreadful, he reads of a hold-up. This determines his course and he goes out to become a bandit. In holding up the stagecoach, however, he finds that he is in reality holding up the hold-up man Red Bill, for whom $1,000 reward is offered. He completes his capture, collects his thousand dollars reward, and returning to the ranch dazzles the owner's eyes with his crisp thousand-dollar bill and wins the girl.

THE COOK'S REVENGE (August 28).—Bridget O'Hoolihan is in love with Pat Flaherty, the cop on her beat. She is the kitchen lady in Mr. Randolph's house, and often entertains Pat, who is a corpulent body. One day while regaling himself on Mr. Randolph's beer, in Mr. Randolph's kitchen, he is discovered by said Randolph and forcibly ejected. Miss O'Hoolihan determines to have her revenge, and when Mr. Randolph goes for an automobile ride, she fills his thermos bottle with coffee strong enough to kill an ordinary man. On the ride the water in the radiator gives out, and as a last resort, the O'Hoolihan brand of coffee is poured into the radiator. The automobile promptly goes crazy with nervous indigestion, and on his return from his perilous ride Mr. Randolph telephones the police to come and arrest the queen of the kitchen. Imagine his mortification, when Bridget's friend, Pat Flaherty comes to make the arrest and turns the tables on Mr. Randolph.

A DAY WITH A HINDOO FAMILY (August 29).—In this beautifully colored Patheplay an intimate and interesting view of Hindoo life is shown. The women do housework, while the men feed their cattle. After the house is cleaned, the women, in order to make their homes more hospitable, draw grotesque figures in the soil before their doors. Nearly all of the water is carried by the women; they move in lines like automatons to and from the well. We also see them preparing their favorite dish, curry.

THE ROAD TO MOREZ, FRANCE (August 29).—This travel picture is beautifully photographed and very interesting. The railroad, which winds its way perilously along the side of the mountain by means of extensive and beautiful stone viaducts, is a remarkable feat of engineering skill. We are treated to a number of views of the quaint little village of Morez, which is devoted almost exclusively to the watchmaking industry.

IN THE VALLEY OF THE BOURNE, FRANCE (August 29).—Another colored picture consisting of a series of exquisite views of this beauty spot of France. The Bourne is a tributary of the Isere, and rushes over cascades and beautiful waterfalls, a turbulent and beautiful stream. At one point in the river, at Pont-en-Royans, the houses are curiously suspended from the cliffs.

THE BLIND GIRL OF CASTLE GUILLE (August 30).—This beautiful Patheplay is adopted from Longfellow's poem by the same name. It tells a story of a beautiful girl, in love with a man and about to marry him. A witch tells her that her lover is false, but she has faith in him. One day when he brings a rabbit in to eat, and hangs his powder horn above the mantel-piece, the girl accidentally knocks the powderhorn down and is blinded by the exploding powder. After this her lover goes away and in the springtime he sees a vision of his former sweetheart with a friend of hers, Baptiste, and he returns to the village and marries Baptiste. As the wedding procession passes the blind girl's house, she asks her brother whose it is, and on learning the identity of the happy couple, follows them to church with the intention of killing her rival. But a vision of an angel appears before her eyes and stays her hand and she falls dead before the altar.

WHIFFLES DECIDES TO BE BOSS (Sept. 2).—Whiffles leaves home for his office with instructions from his termagant wife to return in time for supper, and not five minutes late. That evening Whiffles is playing billiards when the fateful hour arrives. He drops his cue, but a friend persuades him to stay longer, and when he does go home to assert himself in terms that will leave no question as to his being the boss. Two hours late, Whiffles reaches home and puts his friend's theory into practice, but Mrs. Whiffles upsets it so thoroughly that Whiffles, with a weapon in each hand, seeks the giver of false advice, but to his further sorrow, meets the man's wife instead.

IN THE CAUCASIAN MOUNTAINS (Sept. 2).—A short film which is a tour of the beautiful Caucasian mountains, showing the famous Krasnaia Polana casueway, which is followed by a view of Polish immigrants who still call its banks home. The ruins of the ancient city of Afon are also disclosed and the film concludes with a vista down the beautiful Cypress Lane.

THE CLIMAX (Sept. 3).—The greatest sorrow in the life of Jane Summers is her brother Joe's devotion to a life of crime. Jane, realizing the hopelessness of reforming him, resumes her occupation of trained nurse in a hospital. One of the first patients she is cast to care for is Walter Briggs, who, she learns, has been shot by her brother. Through her zealous attention Briggs recovers, and a short time later they are married. All goes well with the couple until Joe, learning of the marriage, visits his sister to borrow money. Joe is threatening her when Briggs, shotgun in hand, returns from a shooting trip. Joe makes his way to a boat, but Briggs, recognizing him only as the man who shot him, fires at the fugitive and Joe's career as a criminal is brought to a climax.

FICKLE FORTUNE'S FAVOR (Sept. 4).—Weary Willie has a lone dollar and a fearful appetite. He decides to part with a portion of his riches for a sandwich, but even as he lays down the bill, a fickle breeze wafts it away. Willie and the sandwich seller give chase, ever near the money, but never quite reaching it. The chase takes them to Coney Island, where they pursue the elusive dollar through the many laugh-provoking devices for which the resort is famous. But the dollar evidently was not meant for them, as it never ceased its flight until it rested in the lap of a millionaire riding in his six-cylinder car.

THE OTTER (Sept. 5).—This film offers a subject which is at one and the same time entertaining and educational. The otter builds its home in the ground on the banks of a stream where large fish are numerous. A peculiar trait of the otter is to seize by the head the fish it preys upon, and it has an amusing difficulty telling the head from the tail of an eel. The otter's fur is of great value, and for that reason the animal is relentlessly pursued by trappers, and the method of his capture is aptly illustrated. The perfect photography and hand coloring of the film makes it additionally attractive as an educational offering.

IN THE ABRUZZI, ITALY (Sept. 5).—A film that, added to its own beauty, has the charm of color photography. It deals with a section of Sunny Italy which is famous for its splendid views which are shown, and beside this the film covers the industries, types and costumes of the natives, closing with a display of very original ideas in hairdressing.

THE PRICE OF JEALOUSY (Sept. 6).—Rose and Ida, sisters, decide to visit an Indian camp and for safety's sake, they disguise themselves as men. Bill Hart, a cowboy, who accompanies the sisters on the trip, is in love with Rose and Ida is so jealous that she informs the Indians that Rose is not a man as she appears. The Indians steal Rose away, but that night remorse overtakes her and she pays the price of her jealousy.

The Ironmaster

2 reels, Sept. 5

Robert North, a Union sympathizer, practicing law in the south, falls in love with Betty Mason, daughter of John Mason, the wealthy Ironmaster. Robert returns to his home regiment, but before going, asks for the hand of Betty. Mason refuses his consent, and Betty is heartbroken. Two years later, Robert, now a Major, attacks the Coalville Iron Works, which are the southern headquarters. Betty learns of the coming attack and sends her brother to warn the Confederates while she detains Robert by feigning illness. While Robert is making love to Betty a soldier reports to him that the advance has been discovered, and the guard at the mill is reinforced. During the battle that follows Robert is wounded and separated from his command. Betty hides Robert in the closet of her bedroom, and after the house has been searched by the Confederates she opens the closet door and finds Robert dead.

VICTOR.

THE LOST COPPERHEAD (Sept. 5).—Prof. Robert Markham, a noted bacteriologist, has a wife whose tender heart will not allow her to see cruelty shown to helpless animals, and when her husband, in spite of her protests, persists in the practice of vivisection, she leaves him and, with her baby boy, makes a home for herself by dressmaking, vowing she will return only when he promises to discontinue his experiments.

Years roll by and the wife, stifling the yearnings of her heart, keeps her vow. The professor absorbed in his work, finds himself in need of a toxin extracted from the deadly copperhead snake. He writes to a friend in the West, who sends him the reptile by parcel post. The letter carrier, in making his rounds, absent-mindedly leaves the box containing the snake on a chair at a fruit stand, where it is found by the professor's little son and a girl playmate, who have come there to buy candy. They take the box to their front stoop and proceed to open it. The mailman in the meanwhile has delivered the letter telling of the snake's arrival, and, upon the professor asking him for the box, remembers his carelessness. He tells the professor, who immediately telephones the police, who, on their arrival at the professor's house, learn the facts and rush out in search of the box.

On coming to the fruit stand the Italian tells them of the little boy and girl who took it away. He points out the direction they took and the professor, mailman, and police start after them at top speed. Passing a saloon, some quarreling toughs delay the police for a few moments; the letter carrier, however, rushes on until he stumbles over a dirt heap, and sprains his knee. A passing bicyclist, hearing his story, loans him his wheel and the chase is on again. The children have by this time removed the cord, and are just about to raise the fatal lid, when the mailman rides up, snatches the box from them and flings the accursed thing into the middle of the street, where happily an automobile crushes out the venomous life.

The professor and the police, having quieted the quarreling toughs, now arrive, and the former, overjoyed at the escape of the children, gives the girl a dollar bill, and offers the same to the boy, who refuses, saying that his mother would not allow him to take money from a stranger. The professor asks to be taken to the mother and on seeing her recognizes his long lost wife. He begs her to come back home with him. She does after he has promised her that he will never again experiment on helpless animals.

THE TALE OF A FISH (Sept. 1).—Ferdie and Bertie are persistent suitors for the hand of Ethel, who loves Jack, who, absorbed in his books, pays but little attention to her. The other two suitors are loved by two charming girls, but ignore them. Ethel, not knowing which to select, offers her hand as a prize for a fishing contest, the winner to marry her. Ferdie and Bertie are at once on the job, but are annoyed by their other sweethearts and catch no fish. Jack forgets about the contest until roused by Ethel and then falls asleep while angling. The other boys in despair then secretly buy each an enormous fish from a small village lad. Ethel, seeing the wonderful fish they have caught, and so that neither of the despised suitors may win her hand, secretly buys an enormous fish from the boy and attaches it to the hook of sleeping Jack and steals away. Bertie is at the hotel and as he displays the wonderful fish, he is the hero of the hour when Ferdie comes in with a still larger fish; in fact a young whale, and is about to claim Ethel's hand, when Jack dashes in with a fish of gigantic proportions and claims the girl, much to the amusement of small boy, who discreetly maintains silence.

POWERS.

THE SURRENDER (Sept. 3).—Tired of her indolent society life, and satiated with attention from her butterfly admirers, Miss Vanderholt, at the death of her father, decides to go and manage the vast farm which is part of her inheritance. Joe Holcomb, the manager her father has on the farm, receives the news of a lady-manager with doubt and misgivings, and reluctantly obeys the order to meet her at the train. Miss Vanderholt arrives at the station and waits impatiently while Joe drives leisurely along the road. When Joe does arrive, she attempts her first lesson in discipline, which results in Joe almost leaving the station without her.

Gallantry on the farm is not that of New York, and her look at Joe when he allowed her to alight unaided from the buggy was withering. Customs also differ here, and she is rudely aroused at 5 a. m. by Bridget, the cook, and her inquiry as to the cause is met by Bridget's curt rejoinder, "the foreman is waitin' for orders, mam."

Breakfast over, Miss Vanderholt is shown over the grounds. She is girlish and naive and the little chicks do look so cute; but the nasty old hen flies at her and she has to beat a hasty retreat to Joe—dignity was almost destroyed. One lesson did not suffice, so she must take a fancy to a little pig and carry it to the house. Bridget promptly refused to shampoo the porker, and quits on the spot.

Harvest hands are usually hungry, and when no dinner was forthcoming, Joe hands Miss Vanderholt the cook book with the curt command to "get busy." Though he is brusque and ungallant, Miss Vanderholt likes him, and she now pitches in and tries cooking with not a little success. His faint praise pleases her, and next day, donning overalls, she helps in the hay field. Realizing the beauty of usefulness, she rides home on the hay rack in the glow of the sunset.

A letter from Count Julien, an old flame of hers, arrives, telling of his hopes of their marriage in the near future. Annoyed, she tears the note up, but the servant pieces it together and shows it to Joe. Joe fails to take her to the Husking Bee that night and the next morning she determines to return home. A cold handshake is their only sign at parting. Miss Vanderholt, with breaking heart, realizes he has conquered her spirit and slowly she returns. She forces Joe's arms about her in complete surrender.

THE REINCARNATION OF A SOUL (Sept. 5).—Edwin August presents a psychological study in eight episodes dealing with the gradual development of inherent thieving proclivities in a child until the age of manhood. The parents see the tendency, but are unable to cope with it and finally, believing the son to be a deliberate criminal, the father expels him from the house. The son's decline is rapid and results in a term in jail, from which he emerges a typical jail bird, the consort of pickpockets and yeggmen. At times there are flashes of his better instinct striving to overcome his weakness, but these become fewer and fewer as he passes down the social scale.

At the time when things seem darkest he is in his hovel looking out into a heavy electrical storm. A flash of lightning strikes and at the same moment his soul is reincarnated. When he rises he marvels at his condition, but is unable to explain it. Wandering out upon the street, he enters an art gallery. He comes upon a girl copying a painting that vaguely recalls something familiar. The girl is his former sweetheart, but he does not recognize her. He watches her work and finally, impelled by something within him, he takes the brush from her and with a few well directed strokes turns the work into a masterpiece. She asks an explanation and he tells her that he himself painted the original. She explains the original was painted over two hundred years before, but he insists. Struck by his sincerity, she attempts to solve the mystery and later finds the explanation in a treatise on reincarnation. The thief has been conquered by the soul of the artist. They are married and later a reconciliation with his parents is effected.

MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING (Sept. 2).—Pearl and Archibald are sweethearts. They call on Mr. and Mrs. Sneed, friends of Archie's. Archie is attentive to Mrs. Sneed and Pearl to make him jealous is attentive to Mr. Sneed. Archie and Pearl quarrel. Archie has Sneed intercede in his behalf, but to no avail. Meanwhile Pearl, lonesome and wishing to make up with Archie, writes him a note that she cannot live without him and asking him to call. Sneed calls again, trying to patch up the quarrel. He asks to borrow the book, when Pearl decides again not to give in to Archie, and forgets all about the letter which she put in the book when Sneed called. Mrs. Sneed finds the letter and determines to investigate. Archie decides to call on Pearl and win her graces. Pearl calls up Sneed and asks him to call, making up her mind at last to let him bring her and Archie together again. Mrs. Sneed follows Sneed to her house and entering after her husband denounces them both. Just as the situation is getting strained, Archie enters and Pearl explains that the note was meant for him and after all make up, they decide that quarreling is useless and determine to all remain friends.

BALDY BELMONT AND THE OLD MAID (Sept. 2).—Belmont loves Lucinda, an old maid. She repulses him, and lavishes her attentions on Percy, the cop. Belmont interrupts one of their love making seances and is thrown out of the house by Percy. Maggie, Lucinda's cook, quits her job and Baldy seeing Lucinda's advertisement for a new cook, determines to masquerade as a woman, and obtains the position, so as to be near the lady of his dreams. He hires a costume and applies for the position, and is accepted and installed as cook. Baldy certainly proves to be an affectionate cook, kissing and hugging Lucinda on the slightest provocation. Percy calls and is fascinated by the charming and well mannered cook. Baldy accepts his attentions, which have now been transferred from Lucinda, and when invited to take a walk with Percy, accepts. Lucinda sees them and upon their return, discharges Baldy and berates Percy for his unfaithfulness. Percy denies the accusation that he had taken the cook out, and Lucinda proceeds to scratch Baldy's face, but only succeeds in dislodging his wig of beautiful auburn hair, exposing his duplicity and unveiling his real self. Lucinda and Percy nearly faint from shock, but Percy recovers in time to trounce Baldy severely and to wind up by kicking him out of the house and out of Lucinda's affection forever.

LOST IN THE NIGHT (Sept. 7).—Dick Halstead, a jewelry salesman, is sent to deliver a necklace worth $6,200 to a Mrs. Collingwood, a neighbor of his friends, the Barrys. Tom Barry and his young wife invite Dick to spend a night at their house. As he had to deliver the necklace to his wealthy patron the following day, he accepts. He shows the necklace to Tom and Pearl and they are fascinated by its beauty. They lock it in their safe, the combination of which is known only to Tom and his wife. They retire. Mrs. Barry addicted to the sleep walking habit, although this was unknown to her husband, gets up in the middle of the night, opens the safe, takes out the jewels, and re-locks the safe. She then wanders around the house and finally goes out into the garden, where she hides the necklace in the hollow trunk of an old tree. She returns to bed. The next morning they come down to breakfast and Dick, being ready to leave, they all go upstairs and Tom opens the safe. To their consternation they find the jewels gone. Dick, nearly frantic with despair, does not know what to do, and Tom and his wife are at a loss to know how to account for the mysterious disappearance, inasmuch as they were the only two who knew the combination to the safe. The strange part of it all was that no other article of value in the safe had been touched. Tom insists that he is responsible to Dick for the loss, as it happened in his house, and immediately mortgages his home to make good Dick's loss, and thus saving his position. Mrs. Barry is nearly heartbroken, and when the detectives gave up all hope of ever finding the theief her sorrows were enhanced. A year passed and during that interval almost every night Mrs. Barry, working under the influences of the subconscious mind, was wont to arise and go to the hiding-place of the jewels and try them on. The mortgage on the home is due and is about to be fore-closed for non-payment, when one night Pearl being ill, Tom goes out to get some medicine for her. She falls asleep and as usual goes out and gets the necklace. When he returns she is holding it in her hand, though it can be seen that she is fast asleep. He cries out in his astonishment and accuses her of being a thief, but only succeeds in awaking her, and then realizing that she had done all this in her sleep, he takes her in his arms and readily forgives her failing, as her finding the necklace enabled them to place Dick absolutely right with his firm, and their money being returned to them, the mortgage was not foreclosed and their home saved.

THE PURSUIT OF JANE (Sept. 4).—At a fashionable summer resort life has become a dull bore to all the guests except Violet and Daisy Meredith, two young sisters, who are being sought after by Sir Algernon Coldstream and Henri St. Ives. Mr. Smith, of New York, a purely American product, finds himself neglected by the younger feminine contingent and becomes the prey of some elderly ladies. This period of calm is broken by the sudden and unheralded advent of Mrs. Jane Garner, a young dashing widow, who finds that through an error no rooms have been reserved for her. Mr. Smith, Sir Algy and St. Ives desert everyone else and beg for the privilege of giving up their rooms to the widow. Coins are tossed and Smith wins the privilege of sleeping on the billiard table and resigning his suite of rooms to the adorable Jane.

As the days pass, Violet and Daisy find themselves deserted and a stern race is on between the American and Sir Algy and St. Ives for the widow's hand. The rivals are watchful and give one another no opportunity to be alone with Jane for even a moment. At last the girls, tearful at being so deserted, appeal to the widow to be merciful, choose one of the three and be done with it and give them a chance at the remaining two.

Jane, really weary of the collective attentions of the trio, determines to be alone for one afternoon at least and hires a boat to row out to the sunset rocks and enjoy a little solitude until the late evening, when the tide, coming in, covers the rocks. She finds that the boatman has only two rowboats left after renting her own, and realizing that she will be pursued by the rivals, she bribes the boatman to bore holes in the bottom of the boats. After she has landed on the rocks, her fears are verified, for Sir Algy and St. Ives hire the remaining boats, and give Smith the laugh as they start for the rock. They agree that the first man to reach Sunset Rock shall be left alone with the widow. Smith, meanwhile, hires a bathing suit, with the intention of swimming out to the widow.

Algy and St. Ives soon outdistance him, but later their boats begin to fill up and finally, waterlogged, capsize and Smith, at first swimming hopelessly behind, forges ahead and leaves them sitting, soaked to the skin, on their overturned boats, from which they are rescued by Violet and Daisy, who, donning bathing suits, swim their ex-suitors to the shore.

Smith, arriving at the rock, finds the widow asleep and determines to put her in a position where she will be at his mercy. He raises the anchor of the boat and getting in it calmly awaits her awakening. She, about to return to the mainland, finds her boat gone and in the possession of the imperturbable Smith, who demands her hand in marriage as the price of taking her off the rock. Although she has grown to care for him, the widow refuses to be driven and says "No" with emphasis, and Smith, nothing daunted, waits for the tide to rise. As the moon comes up, the widow is standing submerged to her knees on top of the now tide-covered rock, but though in tears still defiantly gives "Nay" to his requests. He relents and takes her into the boat and just to be properly femininely inconsistent she then consents, and, a bedraggled pair, they return to the hotel to receive the congratulations of the guests and learn that Sir Algy and St. Ives have returned to their first loves, Violet and Daisy, in a properly humble and repentant spirit.

ECLAIR.

A VEGETARIAN'S DREAM (Sept. 7).—Mr. Slim goes to sleep after an over-hearty meal of his favorite vegetables, and dreams the surprising antics which are here reproduced. Turnips, beets, beans, squashes, their aunts, uncles, and cousins, sprout and grow before your eyes, melting one into the other. Every now and then a surprising incident takes place, as when the lemons play leapfrog, and an intellectual leek photographs two stage-struck froggies with a moving picture camera. Some well behaved lemons suddenly turn into little pigs. A trussed chicken dances tantalizingly through the picture, followed by two onions. Miss Pink Onion is deserted by young Mr. Red Onion. She dejectedly leans over a glass and weeps. It fills up quickly, and the young lady falls in and drowns just as her lover returns. On meeting her fate, Mr. Red Onion sobbingly drowns himself also.

HABITS OF FIELD SPIDERS (Sept. 7).—Since the days of earliest mythology the spider and his web have been a favorite figure of speech. Here we see interesting specimens of these spiders, which inhabit all quarters of the world and grow to their largest size in the tropics. The arachnidium, wherewith they spin the barely visible silky threads which are used for their webs, have been closely studied by inventors and utilized in their models for reproducing this function mechanically. The delicate webs which these gossamer threads form are at once the spider's home and his means of catching his prey. Commercially, they have been used as cross-lines in telescopes, and even utilized for textile fabrics; but in the latter instance, only as curious. The male spider is larger than the female, whose eggs are numerous and usually enveloped in a cocoon. Although the spider's bite is fatal to other insects, it does not affect mankind.

STEEL (2 parts—Sept. 3).—Martin Van Buren, the steel magnate, introduces the Count de Fourviers to his daughter, Nancy, in hope that she will marry a title. Nancy finds the French nobleman amusing, but her heart and soul are bound up in her father's technical expert, Gannett Roberts, a splendid American, who is working to perfect a formula of his which will revolutionize the steel industry by producing a metal as resistant as steel, but of only half its weight. Roberts feels that if he can only amass a fortune, he may be able to win Nancy's hand.

Success crowns his efforts and he submits his precious new metal to a stringent test under the direction of the naval authorities. Van Buren, realizing the tremendous value of Robert's formula, invites him to the house and asks him to name his own price. Robert loses his head and blurts out that he wants nothing but Miss Nancy, for she would be all in all to him. The magnate sneers at the inventor's presumption, and seeing Nancy with the count at the end of his spacious hall, points towards them, and tells Roberts that she is not for such as he, but has been nurtured to grace the family tree of France's most aristocratic family—the Fourviers. Roberts takes her engagement to the count for granted and leaves dejectedly.

Van Buren quickly gets into communication with Luigi, an unscrupulous employe of his, and tells him the formula must be obtained from Roberts regardless of ways or means. Accordingly, Luigi arranges to have two pals of his trip up Roberts, with whom he has scraped an acquaintance. When the tripping occurs Luigi deftly "frisks" Roberts' billfold, which contains the valuable formula. They part shortly after. Roberts suddenly becomes suspicious of the glib stranger and searches his pockets. Upon discovering that his billfold is missing, he follows Luigi, and reaches his door just as the thug motors off to the Van Buren's mills. Roberts and his assistant, Cherry (whom he had fortunately met with), cling to the rear of the machine, but its careenings throw them off when they have almost reached the end of the trip. Leaving the injured Cherry on a rock, Roberts overtakes Luigi just as he has concealed the billfold under a secret trap in the cellar of the mills, in accordance with Van Buren's instructions. Luigi refuses to return the stolen billfold or to reveal its whereabouts. They engage in a struggle, and Roberts is almost overcome, when Cherry, who has limped to the mills, enters on the scene with a revolver, and holds off the ferocious Italian. Then Roberts and Cherry bind Luigi to a stone post, and leave him with the cheerful information that the gunpowder fuse they light near him will blow him and the mill to atoms in an hour, unless Van Buren will force him to give up the formula.

Roberts forces Luigi's chauffeur to drive him to a doctor's—where he leaves young Cherry—and then to the Van Buren mansion. Although it is late, he forces the butler to call his master. But Nancy meets the butler on his way to her father, and learning that Roberts is downstairs, hurries to find out what brought him there at that hour. With bloodshot eyes and hot breath he jerkily tells her of the theft of his precious formula—the work of a lifetime—by her father's hirelings—and that very shortly the powder mills, to which Luigi is bound, will blow up unless her father will restore the formula to him. She sees that he is maddened at his loss, and soothes him by telling him how much she loves him—that she will straighten everything out for him, if he will only drive back as fast as he can and save the mills and the man.

Nancy almost drags Roberts to the machine, and they begin a breakneck trip against time. Luigi, after struggling against his fetters until the blood flowed at shoulders and wrists, was enabled, by superhuman efforts, to reach the key controlling the secret trap. It flew back with enough force to extinguish the perilously short fuse—then he became unconscious from exhaustion. Roberts was relieved at this discovery when he arrived, and overjoyed to discover his billfold, with the formula intact, where it had been concealed under the trap. He cut Luigi's ropes and released the man.

Walking out in the clear air, he was inspired by seeing the country-side parson's beacon lights glimmering in the distance to ask Nancy to marry him then and there. She bravely consented, with the stipulation that he must get into communication with her father and get his consent. So they telephoned from the parsonage, and the discomfited magnate reluctantly withdrew his objections when Nancy told him she would never become a countess and had the formula he wanted anyway. So they weer married.

HER TUTORS (August 17).—Mrs. Van Streek has much wealth and a well-developed ambition to have her daughter, Phyllis, marry a title. Phyllis has but one thought, shared alike by Ed. Holgate, which is, that they were created for each other. Daisy, the small sister of Phyllis, has but one diversion—snapping everything and everyone with her new camera.

To break up the Holgate affair—Mrs. Van Streek packs her family off to her country estate. She then writes to Professor Light to send her music and dancing masters for Phyllis. Daisy innocently discloses this to disconsolate Ed. Holgate. He improves the occasion by acquiring two sets of disguises, and enlisting the sentimental professor's aid in recommending him to Mrs. Van Streek—all goes well, but little Daisy, who is not in her sister's secret—snaps the dancing master when he hugs Phyllis, and the music master when he kisses her. Mrs. Van Streek is scandalized when she sees the incriminating photos. Learning that the despised Ed is on her grounds, walking about with Phyllis, she follows them and confronts him with the photos. Ed is not in the least concerned. In fact, he is quite a hero, saying magnanimously, "What care I who kisses her, so long as I can marry her!" The two lovers are convulsed and mother utterly routed. She gives in, and Daisy gets a new camera from Ed for her first aid to the lovelorn.

THE EVIL POWER (2 parts—Sept. 4).—Dr. Kaishian, an adept at hypnotism, visits a department store, where he meets a young saleswoman. Unable to resist his magnetic eyes, Nora becomes a willing slave, and is duly ensconsed in his home. Here she is soon disillusioned, but the Oriental servant, Nagon, prevents her from escaping.

Dr. Kaishian in the park observes a beautiful woman walking with her husband, William Armstrong. Contriving a ruse whereby he can scrape an acquaintance, he brushes rudely into the couple, and in profuse apology, tenders his card. When the Armstrongs return home, they find one of their children ill, and their regular physician being out on a call, they think of their chance acquaintance with Dr. Kaishian, who is summoned.

The wily doctor loses no time to enmesh Mrs. Armstrong, and before he leaves he has reduced her to a state of servility by the exercise of his hypnotic talents. He compels her to follow him immediately from the house. She attempts to write a letter to her husband, stating that she is going against her will, and just has time to blot it, when the hypnotist tears it up, and forces her to inscribe another, stating that she is leaving voluntarily, and that he will never see her again.

The distracted husband is told by the maid that she suspects Dr. Kaishian is at the bottom of his wife's elopement, and Armstrong rushes to the home of the doctor, who professes deep solicitude. He extracts an apology from the husband, even while the wife sits in a hypnotic state behind the curtains in the same room. Nora, burning with anxiety to expose the evil doctor, is ruthlessly seized by the Hindoo servant, who bears her away. When Armstrong leaves, the doctor hastens to the room where Nagon has concealed Nora and orders him to place her in a dry cistern, and drown her by turning a flooding device. While the Oriental is manipulating the mechanism, the girl seizes the opportunity to wrest from him the iron lever, and deals him a terrific blow on the head, and escapes, while the water wells up and makes him suffer the fate he had intended for her. Upon Armstrong's return from his futile quest, the maid rushes forward with additional evidence that the wife is a prisoner in the doctor's house. This is furnished by the blotter she used when she wrote the first message that the doctor tore up. This time he determines to succeed.

The Armenian is prepared for the terrific encounter that ensues. Through the rooms the wrathful Armstrong and the now terrified hypnotist battle until he reaches where he has a gun concealed. He stands in front of a curtain, and just as he is about to fire at Armstrong, Nora, who is on the opposite side, plunges a stiletto into his side, and he falls dead.

Armstrong recognizes his wife's scream, locates her, and is again happy with her and her children. The police come and discover the evil doctor's body, but not before Nora is far from the house of iniquity.

THE LIGHT WOMAN (Sept. 7).—The poet had a young friend named Paul, and the friendship that existed between them was deep and of long duration. Then came an actress, gay and capricious, whose past was strewn with wrecks of youth who had dared to hope—and lost.

Maturity granted unto the elderly poet a wisdom that perceived the folly that followed a chance meeting between his young friend and this actress, for Paul became madly infatuated. He accepted as sincere caresses that were but the action of a playful mood, while she waited for game more fitting to her wiles.

And because the poet knew her kind and loved his friend, Paul, he pretends to love the vampire in order to save that friend from the wreck he knows will follow. This is accomplished and Paul is neglected for the new man—the poet.

So Paul discovers what he believes to be the perfidy of one he loved better than all else—other than she who portrayed the character of "Carmen." He never realized the poet's sacrifice.

For what to the poet was but a game—a tactic to save his friend, turned to be a sincere response from a heart that responded because it met for the first time the man she trusted as a mate.

Tragedy followed, for "To play with souls is a dangerous thing," and after bitter denunciation from the friend he had tried to save, the realization that he had broken the heart of the girl who for the first time really loved, the poet is despised by both, each impelled by loathing to choose a path of darkness that would lead away from the man who had tried to save. And as the poet bowed his head in grief he tried to solve an answer to—

> "Which do you pity the most of us three?
> My friend, or the mistress of my friend
> With her wanton eyes, or me?"

NESTOR.

THE OATH OF CONCHITA (September 1).—The padre feels the call to preach to the wilder tribes and ascends the tortuous trails to the mountain village home of Conchita, where he teaches the Indians kindly ways and good deeds. Conchita, daughter of Pedro, is impressed by padre's earnest teachings and is prevailed on to accompany him down to the mission to be instructed.

The days pass and happy hours with Conchita awaken forbidden love in the padre's heart, which he conquers only by the timely arrival of Ricardo, a Spanish grandee, who wooes and wins Conchita and marries her.

But another, El Sombriado, the black one from the mountains, has a life-long love for Conchita, companion of his boyhood days, and having lost her thrugh marriage, he comes down to the mission and slays Ricardo even as the ceremony is concluded. Conchita takes her oath of vengeance and follows El Sombriado to the mountains. She, in turn, is followed by the padre. At the wayside shrine she renews her oath, and the padre, close on her heels, is in the meantime captured by El Sombriado and a few renegade friends.

Conchita discovers the padre a prisoner and releases him, to be followed by El Sombriado and his men. A meeting takes place beneath the wayside shrine and El Sombriado, now maddened by jealousy, attacks Conchita with his knife. Conchita, fresh from the renewal of her oath, meets him, knife in hand, and in the struggle that follows

El Sombriado falls back against the cross of the shrine. Aged by time and weather, the arm of the cross falls and, striking the "black one" on the head, ends his life. The padre offers a prayer over the dead Indian, while the others flee in terror, thinking the punishment of El Sombriado divine.

Conchita is returned to her mountain home by the padre, who then seeks solace in the rosary and cell, while Conchita goes back to her father's home, her oath fulfilled.

GOLD AND WATER (September 3).—Harry Burton, a young planter, wakes up one morning to find his fruit frost-bitten: he is ruined. He determines to get out and on picking up a newspaper he reads that gold has been found in a certain region. He decides to start on a prospecting trip; so he sells his plantation and starts on his journey. Some days later he finds himself in the desert and stops at a desert well to refill his canteen. While there he meets a young girl, Alice Manning, who lives with her father in a cabin nearby. She tells him that the well is the only one in a radius of sixty miles, so Burton decides to camp near and try his luck in the hills close by. Alice and Burton meet several times and their friendship ripens into love. One day Burton discovers gold and shows a piece of it to Alice's father, Jed Manning. Jed, who has searched in vain for many years, is jealous and when Burton tells him that he is going to the nearest city to get some supplies, Jed waits until he has gone, then jumps his claim. Alice protests, but Jed, with some of his men, takes possession.

Burton returns and discovers Jed has robbed him. He tries to take it back, but Jed and his men are armed and threaten to shoot him. Burton takes Alice into his confidence and shows her a plan whereby he hopes to regain possession of his claim. During the night he throws up an embankment around the well, and taking his rifle gets inside and awaits developments. Next morning one of Jed's men arrives at the well, with a pail to obtain water, but is warned off by Burton. The man goes to Jed and tells him what has occurred and Jed takes his two men and goes to the well. Under Jed's orders the two men attempt to rush the well, but Burton fires, wounding one of the men in the foot, and they have to retreat, with the wounded man.

The next day Jed runs out of water and goes back to the well with Alice, who is carrying a jug, to get a drink for the wounded man. Alice fills the jug with water and climbs over the barricade. She is seized by her father who takes the jug from her. Burton, from a distance, sees this, fires and the bullet breaks the jug. Jed and his men are fighting with Burton, when the wounded man, whom they have left in the tent, becoming delirious, wanders onto the scene, raises his revolver and fires at Jed, wounding him. In the meantime Alice has returned to the tent and discovers that the wounded man is missing. She immediately starts in search of him and finds him outside the barricade with her father, wounded. She calls for Burton; he comes to her assistance and they take her father to their tent. Later all ends happily as Alice is the promised wife of Burton, and he and Jed are partners in the "Red Claim."

WON BY A SKIRT (September 5.)—Ramona and Corrinne, in company with their father, while spending the summer at the seashore, enter into unusual complications as the result of Ramona's constant flirtation with Mr. Lee. The two lovers are suffered to be interrupted, parted and pursued through their entire courtship as a result of her father's disapproval. At last the desperate parent decides upon a new plan of action, and Romona is transplanted from the temptations of the resort into Miss Dilly Pickle's Select School for Girls. Ramona's sister, Corrinne, assists Lee in a preparatory counterplan to baffle the opposing father.

Having lodged his daughter safely within the sanctuary of Miss Pickle's school, the father returns to his home in a very satisfactory state of mind, while his daughter relapses into a state of love-lorn melancholy. She, however, is suddenly revived by the unexpected appearance of a Fanny Fleming, alias Lee Moran, her lover, who, having arrayed himself in the female garb, has entered Miss Pickle's Select School for Girls.

The two immediately become affectionate chums to the satisfaction of their principal. Love's course, however, does not run smoothly, owing to her watchful eye, which furnishes many amusing situations. Later, the father's visit adds to the discomfort of the lovers, and they hie themselves hence to a position of seclusion, where they may coo undisturbed. Lee, a habitual smoker, avails himself of this chance to enjoy his pipe in peace. His state of ecstasy is, however, suddenly interrupted by the unexpected appearance of the father, who happens upon the ardent lovers from the rear. A general turmoil follows in which Lee is fully exposed, later ending with the father's forced appreciation of their inseparable hearts.

FRONTIER.

FLIRTY FLORENCE (September 4).—Our story deals with Flirty Florence, the wife of Jim Baker, who is with a carnival company. Business has been none too brisk and it is necessary to resort to most any measure to get sufficient money to carry the project along. Jim decides that Florence must try her wiles on the wealthy young lawyer, Horace Bradley by name, a successful practitioner in the town that they are working. She fixes herself up as fascinatingly as possible and succeeds in interesting Bradley to the extent that he agrees to go with her the following day to the carnival and look over the grounds, as Flirty Florence has informed him that she has money to invest and the carnival business appeals to her. The next day Miss Frost, an eccentric old maid, finding it impossible to use three opera tickets herself, brings them to the Bradley home just as Mr. Bradley is leaving for the office to keep his engagement with Florence. The mother-in-law can see no reason why he can't accompany them to the opera; his excuse that he has an engagement at two and that he can't break it isn't satisfying to her. Mrs. Bradley, the loving little wife, is satisfied that her husband is honest in the extreme and she kisses him goodbye, believing implicitly in him.

We next see Flirty Florence and Bradley coming from his office building, get into an automobile and ride away. The automobile that carries Miss Frost comes into view: she sees Bradley with a strange woman and is greatly shocked and decides to follow them. We next see the automobile containing Florence and Bradley draw up to the curb: they alight and go into the carnival ground. The auto with Miss Frost comes up: she sees them and decides it is her duty to tell the wife and goes off with that intention in mind. She arrives at the Bradley home just as the wife and mother are starting for the opera; she induces them to get into her automobile, telling them what she has seen. They start away towards the carnival grounds, the mother and the old maid trying to fire the gentle little wife with a feeling for revenge. They arrive at the carnival grounds and a search for Bradley and Flirty Florence is started.

In the meantime Florence has missed no opportunity to impress Bradley with her charms, while Jim Baker, the husband, has kept very close in the background, waiting for his opportunity. The merry-go-round stops. Florence and Bradley get off. Mrs. Bradley, the little wife, comes and sees what she apparently thinks is unfaithfulness on the part of the husband. The demon of jealousy takes full possession of her and she demands an explanation from him. Flrence, seeing the game is up, starts to get away. The wife grabs her and when the dust clears, the little wife demonstrates her ability as a scrapper, for Florence has received a very good beating. Officers come upon the scene and a general mixup ensues. The wife, realizing now that her husband is in danger of arrest, very cleverly arranges for his escape. She rushes him to the auto and hurries him away. Florence apparently gets her just dues for she is hurried to the police station. The next morning Mr. Bradley hobbles out onto the lawn looking as though he had passed through a Texas cyclone, the mother-in-law storming in the background. Mrs. Bradley comes out of the house with the desire to go to her husband, but the mother prevents it.

In the meantime the husband has picked up the morning paper in which he reads of the arrest of Florence, the most notorious black-mailer known to modern times. He is sufficiently quick-witted to grasp the opportunity. The wife and mother-in-law rush to him, he shows them the article, tells them that he knew her all the time and was arranging to have her arrested and prosecuted. The mother-in-law is a bit skeptical, but the little wife "swallows" the story. The ending scene shows Florence locked behind prison bars.

THE SURGEON OF ABAJO (September 6).—A young doctor, Harry Lewis by name, was bred in the little town known as Abajo, New Mexico. Close neighbors with him was a widow with her daughter, Molly. The two children were raised together from childhood and formed an attachment for each other. As time went on Harry went East to medical college and studied medicine. In the meantime while Harry was at college, Lee Balek, a prosperous young ranchman, began to pay attentions to Mary. A few years later when Harry finished his college term and received his diploma as an M. D., he returned to his little native town and began to renew his romance with Molly. He proposes to her, but she is a little doubtful whether she still cares for him, and he reminds her that she promised, years before, to become his wife. She tells him to return tomorrow for his answer. Lee, who was on his way to call on Molly, sees the little scene being acted at the house of the girl whom he thinks is his sweetheart. He becomes very jealous at this and does not call on her.

After leaving Molly, Harry on his way home passes the telegraph station. The operator stops him and delivers a message to him that was just received, offering him a position as interne at a big hospital in a nearby city, but he must take up his residence at once. He discovers that he has not time to return to Molly and tell her goodbye, but writes a short note to her telling her to write to him and send her answer there. Lewis goes on his way to prepare for the journey. In the meantime Lee has come up to the station to mail a letter. The operator, knowing him to be a constant caller at Molly's house, asks him to deliver the note for him. Thinking that if he can get hold of the note he might cause Molly to feel badly towards Lewis, he agrees to deliver the message, which he does not do. Instead he goes to Molly's home and tells her of Lewis leaving without a word to her, and proves his statement by showing her Lewis getting on the train going away. Molly is grief-stricken, thinking that she has been jilted by Lewis, but it does not help Lee's attentions to her whatever.

A short while afterwards Molly decides to devote her life to nursing, and she enters the Mercy Hospital at Denver, as a probationary nurse. Time elapses and we find Harry the physician in charge of St. Joseph's and Molly has become quite an important nurse of Mercy Hospital. One day Lee is standing at the railroad station in a little town talking to the operator, when the mail train passes, dropping the mail sack and striking Lee in the side, knocking him down and injuring him internally. He is carried to the hospital of which Harry is in charge. The head nurse there, finding herself short of nurses, wires Mercy Hospital in Denver for a few nurses to be sent on to her. They are sent and Molly is one of them. She is put in charge of Lee's case as private nurse. Upon examination of Lee the doctors agree that the only chance he has for life is to be operated on; Harry is asked to perform the operation.

The patient is taken to the operating room and Molly, doing her duty as a nurse, shows Lee every comfort possible, which causes jealousy to spring up in Harry's heart. Just as he is about to perform the operation, the thought comes to his mind that if he should not do the operation correctly Lee might die, and he would have a clear field with Molly. He has quite a struggle with himself between love and professional duty, finally deciding that for Molly's sake, he must perform the operation and bring Lee on his feet again. He does so.

A few days later, while in the sick room, he places Molly's hand in that of Lee's and congratulates them, but Molly, thinking more of Harry, decides to tell him so. They leave the room together and Lee, seeing what misery he is causing, decides to confess the wrong he did. He does so and gives the note that was sent by Harry to Molly to her. She reads it and sees how they have both suffered. Happiness is brought to them and even to Lee to think that he has made the girl he cares for happy.

RELIANCE.

THE GIRL SPY'S ATONEMENT (Aug. 25).—Norma, the daughter of a Confederate general, is a spy in the interest of the South. Her father learns that Capt. Willis, of the Northern forces, has some valuable papers, and, knowing that Norma has already made the captain's acquaintance, he details her to get possession of them. This is something that the girl almost rebels against, for she knows that Willis loves her and she returns his love. But duty first was the slogan of the South, so she dresses as a boy and starts out after Willis. She finds where he has put up his tent for the night and, entering, she steals the papers from under his pillow, placing an envelope of blank paper in their place. Willis half awakens and fires after what he thinks a retreating figure, but finding what he supposes to be the plans, he falls asleep again. The girl receives the shot in the arm and staggers home. Willis rides to the outlying camp and delivers the blanks. He is held as a traitor, for his acquaintance with Norma is well known. The girl, still weak, hears that Willis is to be shot next morning at sunrise. She starts off on horseback to the camp of the Northern general. To him she tells the story of the stolen plans and exonerates Willis to his satisfaction. He will send a reprieve, but it is doubtful if it will arrive in time. She offers to take it herself, and starts out on a wild ride to the outlying camp. She arrives just in time to prevent the execution. With loving care she regains her health and after the war Willis comes South again to claim the former spy as his bride.

PEG, OF THE "POLLY P" (Aug. 27).—Peg is the daughter of a canal boat captain. Her heart is given to young Bill who assists her father. But although the captain is satisfied with the match, Peg's ambitious mother has other plans for her daughter and engages her to a fashionable barber in the city. When Bill protests he is discharged and he leaves the canal boat vowing vengeance on the barber. He arrives in the city and going to the barber shop proceeds to pitch into the barber only to find he has the wrong one, the other fellow having left town to join a party on the "Polly P." At the party the barber incurs the displeasure of all the men on account of the tremendous hit he makes with the girls, that is, all save Peg, who is annoyed by his attentions. The climax is reached when the barber, in a spirit of jollity, offers to shave the captain's whiskers for nothing. The men, egged on by the captain, throw him into the canal. He lands on shore and tells his troubles to the constable, who boards the boat and places the captain under arrest. On the way to the lockup they meet Bill running away from another constable. They join forces, and, assisted by the captain's wife, they put the two constables to rout. Then, jumping into the canal boat, they start off at full speed. The constables catch up with them, but too late—they have passed the stone marking the State boundary and cannot be touched. Peg's mother removes her objection to Bill and the lovers are happily reunited.

THE SOCIAL SECRETARY (August 30).—The Braggs, a family of newly riches, employ Jean Alden as their social secretary. She is to introduce them into society and teach them what to do and say. Jean finds the Braggs household in great disorder. Mr. Braggs is afraid of his servants, and his business secretary, a designing young fellow, is making love to Elsie Braggs. The Braggs' son is a weakling, addicted to cocktails and cigarettes. He proceeds to fall in love with Jean, but she laughs at the idea. She takes charge of the house and puts the servants in their place, instructs Mrs. Braggs, and tries to influence Elsie into the right direction. Fearing that this very competent young woman will interfere with his game, the secretary tells Mrs. Braggs that Jean is planning to marry her son. The old lady, very indignant, discharges the girl, who very much amused, packs and makes ready to leave the house. On her way through the hall she sees Elsie hurriedly flinging some jewels into a small satchel and surmises what is about to happen. She enters the room and asks Elsie if she is going to elope. Elsie answers in the affirmative. Jean begs and pleads with her to no avail. As a last resource she tells her the story of her own young girlhood, when she left a rich home with a man who wanted only her money. Elsie listens, but at the close says the man she loves would not be as the man who betrayed and deserted the other girl. Fawcett, tired of waiting at the gate, enters the room. Jean gets between them; he pushes her aside; when she persists he strikes her brutally. With a face filled with triumph, she turns to Elsie and asks her what she thinks of him now. As he faces Elsie she shrinks from him, finally flinging herself into Jean's arms. Seeing that he has lost out, he leaves the house. Elsie tells her parents what she had been about to do and calls Jean her savior. Filled with gratitude and remorse, Mrs. Braggs tells Jean that she may marry her son. But Jean declines. Realizing that she can no longer remain with them, she accepts a large check from Mr. Braggs. She returns to her little son, her most important reason for refusing the heir to the Braggs' millions.

THANHOUSER.

AN UNROMANTIC MAIDEN (August 24).—The self-made millionaire was ambitious; he wanted to break into society, but found it very hard. Finally he decided that the only way to accomplish it was to marry his daughter to a title. In the vacation preceding her senior year she was passing vacation at the summer home of her parents. One day the father arrived with a noble count and explained to the maiden that the count would consent to wed her for a dowry of $100,000. The girl said the price was reasonable enough, but she did not want to marry, as she was happy in school. Her mother's tears moved her at last, and she consented to marry the count.

Had it not been for a trip with her fiancé on her father's yacht, she might have been a noblewoman now. The count, however, was so ungallant as to say that he hated books, and this led to the climax. The girl realized that without books she would be very unhappy, and by a clever ruse, managed to get rid of the count while the boat was heading along at full speed. He did not know he was going ashore, but he went, and when the girl yawningly communicated to her parents the fact that the count had departed, they did not know what to think of it. A few weeks later the unromantic maiden found herself in college.

THE WARD OF THE KING (2 parts—August 26).—In the days of Louis XIV of France, his nobles were not permitted to contract marriages without his consent. Particularly was this enforced in the case of orphan heiresses, whose hands were bestowed upon favorites of the monarch without the unfortunate young women being consulted at all. Constance Du Vallon inherited a large estate, and was deeply in love with a young gallant, whose home was near her home. This noble, however, was in disfavor at court, and his suit was frowned upon. Finally the king commanded the girl to repair to court without delay and there wed one of his favorites, a dissipated count, whom she loathed. There was no opportunity to escape, for the message was brought by a detachment of the king's guards, ironically described as "an escort of honor."

Shortly after Constance and her escort had departed, her suitor arrived at her home and was mad with grief on hearing what had happened. Declaring he would rescue her no matter what the odds, he set forth alone. Fortune favored him, for he came upon the party while they were resting at a wayside inn. The soldiers tried to capture him, but he fought them to a standstill, and aided by his plucky fiancée, escaped on horseback and outdistanced the servants of the king.

The pursuit was hotly taken up, and the fugitives were trapped at the ocean front. Desperately they took to the water, captured a fishing boat and set forth to sea. After many privations they were picked up by a Dutch ship bound for America, kindly treated, and a minister who was aboard made them man and wife. Their troubles were not over, for the ship was wrecked and the young wife and her husband were the only ones saved, drifting ashore on a piece of wreckage. A tribe of Indians captured them, and would have cruelly treated them had it not been for a peculiar bracelet the girl wore. She explained that the jewel had been given to her by an Indian chief she had befriended in France, and this fact changed her foes to friends, for the chief was one of their own tribe who had been sincerely loved. The future life of the woung couple was happy, and the wife never regretted that she had flouted the authority of the king to follow the fortunes of the man she loved.

A SPARTAN FATHER (August 29).—He was proud of his title, "The Honest Cop." Everyone on his beat knew and liked him. He never won promotion, meekly admitting that he did not have the head to be a commanding officer. His ambitions entirely concerned his motherless son. When the boy was a little chap, the other policemen made much of him. When he grew up, the father was convinced that his heir was destined to become a great man. No one told him that the boy was degenerating into a loafer.

While in the station one night a man entered to tell of a daring attempt to rob him. His assailant got away, but he left his hat behind him. "The Honest Cop" looked at the hat, and recognized it as that of his son. The old policeman went to his home, and his son trembled before him. He knew the boy was guilty, and sorrowfully led him to the station. There, his duty completed, he handed in his resignation, and went away, a broken-hearted man.

The complainant, however, was kind-hearted. The young man was not a hardened criminal, he had only yielded to a sudden temptation. The charge was dropped, and the old policeman's heart made happy. In later years the son showed that he had learned his bitter lesson, and his father had reason to be proud of him.

AMERICAN.

WHILE THERE'S LIFE (Sept. 1).—Rose had hoped to marry Brill and her's was the true love, but the sister became Mrs. J. Brill and Rose made the entry in her diary, then fell into a restless sleep. Six months of marriage found Mrs. Brill seeking some other attractions beside the hearth and she resumed her music, while the husband as a chemist was busy in research.

A friend drummer thought he saw a business opportunity for himself in Mrs. Brill's ability and gave her all the assistance and encouragement he could, which caused the wife to forget her husband. This preyed so on his mind that he became forgetful, and, as the wife was leaving one evening against his wishes, he made an error which caused an explosion and resulted in blindness.

The wife was so far advanced as to make public appearances professionally, and in her selfishness, she killed her husband's chance of recovery at the critical moment; but this did not matter when a big offer to tour was made her, and she accepted, leaving and probably breaking her marriage ties forever. This gave Rose, whose attention and devotion to the husband had been constant, every reason to feel that for herself—while there's life—she had every reason to hope.

THE POISONED CHOP (Sept. 4).—Mr. Green, in order to get rid of a collie dog given to his wife as a present, and upon which she is bestowing too much affection, neglecting her three-year-old son, decides upon giving it a poisoned chop after he has tried various other means of getting rid of it. Stealing a chop from the kitchen, he poisons it and places it in front of the kennel. But before the collie perceives it, it is stolen by a tramp, who, scenting a peculiar odor from the cutlet, exchanges it for a fresh one from the kitchen of Green's house.

When Mrs. Green goes out walking she cautions the maid to take good care of the child during her absence. The maid, not wanting to be bothered with the little boy, places him in the dog house, where he begins to eat part of the dog's meal. Inquiring for the child upon his wife's return, Mr. Green is informed that he is in the dog house. Horrified, Green confesses what he has done and Mrs. Green immediately summons the doctor, who cannot find anything wrong with the child. Meanwhile a gardener's boy, who had seen the actions of the tramp, tells all he knows to Green. Fearing that he will be guilty of murder, Green, in the company of a policeman, the little boy and the dog, sets out in search of the tramp, whom he finds at the roadside eating the last morsel of meat from the bone of the chop. Green then learns that the poisoned chop had been left at his kitchen. He reaches the dining-room of his home just in time to prevent his wife from eating the poisoned cutlet.

THE MYSTERIOUS EYES (Sept. 6).—Richard Frawley, who lives with his daughter on a ranch, sells his property and is paid for it in currency. As they are in a rough country, he places the money in a belt about his person and they decide to start for the East at once. In order to make the train, as they are a long way from the station, they are obliged to spend a night at McGovern's Inn, a rough western place. McGovern hears of the sale of the ranch, also that Frawley has the money with him and that they are to spend a night at the inn. He decides to watch them and find where the old man keeps the money. For this purpose he has a picture so arranged that from the next room he can look through the eyes of the picture and watch his victims.

Frawley and his daughter arrive and are given this room; the daughter sees the glittering eyes in the picture, but does not betray it, although she is terrified. She makes an excuse to leave the room, writes a short note to her father, which she manages to slip into his hand unobserved, telling him of the eyes and for him to feign illness; that she will take the money on her person and ostensibly ride for a doctor.

She does this and McGovern is very glad to have her out of the way. Although he has watched carefully, he has not seen the girl take the money belt.

After she has gotten safely away, the father, who has feigned sleep, wakes up and tells McGovern his daughter has taken his money. McGovern immediately starts in pursuit of the girl. The father is thus enabled to make his escape, which he does and joins his daughter at a place they had agreed upon.

GAUMONT.

AN EXPLORER'S TRAGEDY (August 19).—This pathetic story concerns a Polar explorer and "the girl he left behind him." The opening scene shows us Morris Parvill's loved ones awaiting news of his return, and their joy when receiving news that he is hurrying home. Morris at last reaches home, and his sweetheart is happy in the knowledge that the Polar wastes have seen the last of her beloved. But the "Wanderlust" again seizes Morris, and when Captain John Hugon makes a special trip to see his lieutenant, bearing with him a letter from the heads of the Geographical Society, stating that the government has placed further funds at their disposal, torn between love of his sweetheart and the call of the Frozen North, Morris eventually steals away once more.

An interminable period of waiting now ensues. Days, weeks, months, pass slowly by, and Gertrude's heart is breaking with the suspense. Her only consolation is the diary in which she jots down her innermost sacred thoughts.

Next we are shown the expedition. Morris is writing in his pocket-book: " . . . only three of us now remain. Capt. Hugon dying. Sledge lost. Provisions will last two days only and the first food depot is 120 miles to the South. Fierce blizzard. Those who are dear to me . . . "

And then one evening ill news knocks at the door of the old homestead, a telegram is received, sent by the Navy Minister, "who regrets to inform the Parvill family that a part of the Capt. Hugon expedition has perished 60 miles from the Pole. The body of Morris Parvill has been recovered . . . " But we must draw a veil over the sufferings of the bereaved ones. It is only such as they who can realize the suspense, the anguish, the heart-breakings, involved in Polar exploration.

A TREE-MENDOUS PROPOSITION (August 21).—Capt. John Parry and Rupert Lark, both past the age when love's young dream is at its zenith, are rivals for the hand of the beautiful and wealthy young widow, Julia Mount. They simultaneously receive invitations to the young woman's country place, "The Squirrels," and vie one with the other for premier place in her affections. But the merry widow has no really serious intentions, and has invited them merely out of pique, because—— but is it any use of trying to explain a woman's "because?" Her dear Frank has annoyed her, so she will seek consolation elsewhere! At least that was the raison d'etre of the two invitations. But having gotten the two elderly aspirants to "The Squirrels," the problem is, how to get rid of them decorously. A happy thought strikes Julia whilst admiring the mistletoe growing at the top of a tall oak tree. "The first who brings me a bunch of that mistletoe, plucked by his own hand, will obtain my heart and hand!"

Capt. Parry gives up this game in disgust, but Rupert is a deep one. He hires a small boy to climb the tree and fetch down a large bunch, then he tears his clothing, smudges his face, and in other ways adds plenty of "local color," and then kneeling at the lady's feet, claims the reward. Alas! Nemesis, in the shape of the afore-mentioned small boy, is dogging his footsteps: "Hi, Mister, take this other bunch of mistletoe at half the price, w'll you? Twenty-five cents 'll buy this one!" Rising abashed from his knees, Rupert sees his rival gloating over his downfall, but both are plunged into the deepest depths of despair when the capricious widow begs to be permitted to introduce to them her future husband, "dear Frank!"

SAVED BY HIS CHILD (August 26).—Will Johnson has the misfortune to rent the flat next to that occupied by John Malvers, a notorious yeggman, but lives in blissful ignorance of the fact. Malvers' pal, Burton, rushes in one day to inform him that the police are on his track, and cautions him to lie low for a while. Burton goes home, and is accused by his paramour of complicity with Malvers, which, however, he stoutly denies. Eva Chappell, however, is not satisfied with the denial, and finding Malvers' address in Burton's pocket, she tells the police of her suspicions.

The police go to arrest Malvers, but he eludes them by clambering over the roofs, dropping an automatic pistol in his hurry. The Browning automatic is found by Johnson's small son, who places it in his school satchel. Later in the day Malvers calls to see Johnson, accuses him of having "split" to the police, and is about to take his revenge by shooting the unfortunate workingman, when Johnny, cute little fellow, shows his mother the Browning automatic, clambers out again on to the roof, and is just in time to save his father's life.

TWO JILTED LOVERS (August 28).—Lawrence Bishop has an awful blow dealt him when his fiancée writes that through the fault of circumstances she is obliged to bid him good-bye forever. Life now holds no charms for Lawrence, and he essays suicide, with the net result of one sprained wrist. His great grief causes Lawrence to burst forth into poetry of the doggerel order, and he later conceives an idea for a 20th Century "Paradise Lost." He will write 400 verses under the title of "The Chicken Who Turned Me Down," and it shall be an epic. His right wrist being sprained, he hires a stenographer to do the clerical work, and starts in to make poetic history. One day he finds the poor stenographer's face bathed in tears, and on seeking a reason for this lachrymous condition of his amanuensis, is informed that she, too, is a victim of unrequitted love. Together they hurl invectives at their opposite sexes, and once more settle down to work on the great epoch-making poem. But somehow the muse will not move Lawrence—after a week the best effort he has made is:

"I never knew
Till I met you
What love could be
My sweet Mar-ee" and after his "sweet Mar-ee" has read this ambitious effusion, the distracted Lawrence falls upon his knees and begs her to become his wife. She consents, stating that they can then console one another for ever and a day.

LUX.

A TIMELY REMINDER (Sept. 5).—James Grant paints a portrait of his child upon her deathbed. Time goes on and he foolishly gives way to dissipated habits, which cause him to neglect his devoted wife. One night, while enjoying himself with his friends, he desires to show them a portrait he has painted of a lady to whom he has been paying undue attention. He writes a note to his wife and sends a servant home to fetch it. The wife substitutes the portrait of her dead child and thus recalls her husband to his better self in a pathetic and effective manner.

It will increase your box office receipts because your patrons will notice at once how much brighter and clearer your pictures are. And what's more, it will

Cut 2-3 from Your Monthly Lighting Bill

That sounds as if we were stretching it, doesn't it? But we are not and just to show you, we will ship you one on 30 days free trial and let you prove it. If it does not do all we claim for it, ship it back at our expense and it won't cost you one cent.

If this sounds "good" to you, send for our little booklet "Compensarc vs. Rheostat" and find out the particulars.

You are paying the Lighting Company half your profits every day you wait.

Good Light Draws the Crowd

A brilliantly lighted exterior is a "business getter" for your theater. There is an undeniable attraction about plenty of light—it gives your place a cheery, inviting appearance which gets and maintains custom.

Good light also shows up the signs and is one of your most telling advertisements.

The Type W Flame Arc Lamp

is one of the most powerful lighting units known. It is especially adapted to illuminating the exteriors of theaters. This efficient lamp is economical to install and maintain—one set of carbons burns for 100-120 hours without attention, and only one of these carbons needs renewing at each trim.

The lamp is thoroughly reliable and substantially constructed.

TRAP DRUMMERS Who can produce proper sound effects for motion pictures are in demand everywhere.

Unfortunately, very few are fitted for the work, owing to their limited knowledge on the subject. For instance, horses trotting on soft ground, or grass, should not sound like a stone quarry in operation, or a calm river sound like Niagara Falls.

For many years I have made a study of dramatic sound effects, and my devices for producing same are in use throughout the world, and acknowledged the best that money and brains could conceive.

For $2.00, cash with order, I will send you complete instruction, not only in the proper use of sound effects, but how to make many simple devices for producing them, which knowledge will make your services indispensable. Address orders to

We are now printing the word "Eastman" on the margin of all our Cine film. We want the exhibitor to know when he is and when he is not getting Eastman film. It will be to his advantage—and ours.

Of course it will take time for such identifiable films to reach the consumer—so don't expect results at once—but it's a step in the right direction—for your interests and ours.

FLORENCE ROBERTS IN SAPHO

The Biggest Theatrical Circuits want "Sapho," with Florence Roberts!

We'll have a surprise announcement for you shortly. The biggest theatrical circuits, both East and West, are trying hard to close with the Mutual for "Sapho" rights. You'd be honestly and truly surprised if you knew WHOM WE MEAN. We'll print the names as soon as the deals go through and the contracts are signed. "SAPHO" (WITH FLORENCE ROBERTS) WILL GO INTO THEATRES THAT NEVER "PLAYED" A FILM BEFORE. Look out for the surprise announcement. And stop marvelling that we are the producers that made the brand that "jumped" the business of a certain film service right in midsummer!

"One Round O'Brien" Flirts into the Opening Reel of His Series. and It's SOME Reel!

When you get "One Round O'Brien's Flirtation" (released Tuesday, Aug. 26), you don't merely get a good comedy reel. At least, don't look at it that way. THE OCCASION IS AN IMPORTANT ONE. For the picture is simply the first of a series, THE BEST COMEDY SERIES EVER RELEASED. You grant that Fred Mace is the world's best comedian, don't you? You grant that "One Round O'Brien" was his funniest creation—yes? WELL, THEN, CAN YOU THINK OF A BUNCH OF FUNNYFILMS THAT CAN BEST A BUNCH OF "O'BRIENS"? If you have any doubts in the matter, be sure to see the "Flirtation" film, Number One in the Series. Then remember that Mace is making each film in the series a little better than the one that went before. It'll mean only one thing: you'll book the whole crazy-funny series if you have to change service to do it!

Week Beginning Sunday. August 24

THE LADY KILLER—Billy Garwood feature, Sunday, the 24th.
ONE ROUND O'BRIEN'S FLIRTATION—Fred Mace feature, Tuesday, the 26th.
A PERILOUS RIDE—Lamar Johnstone feature, Saturday, the 30th.

THANHOUSER MADE THE MUTUAL SPECIAL IN FOUR REELS

"MOTHS" WITH MAUDE FEALY

The Mutual Film Corporation announces as a special release the great OUIDA play of the above title. Miss Fealy, starred in this film, is known from coast to coast as a legitimate theatrical star, and has positively never been seen to better advantage than in this motion picture of "MOTHS." With her is a special Thanhouser cast, including such favorites as

WILLIAM RUSSELL GERDA HOLMES HARRY BENHAM MRS. LAWRENCE MARSTON
LILA CHESTER

"Moths" has been described as the most extraordinary description of a woman that has been penned. Remember:

> "She had chastity, and she had also courage."
> "She was the martyr of a false civilization, of a society as corrupt as that of the Borgias, and far more dishonest."
> "She is innocent always and yet—When the moths have gnawed the ermine, no power in heaven or earth can make it again altogether what it was."

You must not miss this Marvel-Play and its wonderful star. There are wonderful lithos, too, and they should attract people to a play that will hold them.

Special terms and bookings can be had exclusively through the offices of THE MUTUAL FILM CORPORATION, Masonic Temple, 71 West 23rd Street, New York City

THE THANHOUSER THREE-A-WEEK

Released Sunday August 31 — FRAZZLED FINANCE

We could lay stress on the fine comedy story in this reel, but instead we call attention to a rowboat upset! It's easily the best comedy boat upset you've ever seen in a picture.

Released Tuesday, September 2 — THE VETERAN POLICE HORSE (2 Reels)

It's only the story of a horse, but it will go down into film history as a dramatic classic. If you want to interest new and fine people in your theatre, go tell the local Humane Society you have this subject.

Friday September 5 — NO RELEASE because of two-reeler of preceding Tuesday.

COMING! Sunday, Sept. 7, "His Last Bet," an all men's picture (the horrid things!) with Harry Benham, Justus Barnes, David Thompson and other Thanhouser Males.
COMING! All the time—to our lobby—THE THANHOUSER PLAYERPOSTER. It solves the posterless reel problem. Ask your exchange man the cost.
COMING! The Thanhouser Kidlet in "Taming Their Grandchildren," Tuesday, Sept. 9th.
COMING! The Thanhouser Kid, in "The Message to Headquarters," Friday, Sept. 12th.
COMING! The Thanhouser Twins (Triumphant Return) in "Life's Pathway" (date soon).
COMING! Eugene Moore (Triumphant Return) in his personally directed picture, "Flood Tide" (Friday, Sept. 19th).
COMING! A staggering list of THANHOUSER CLASSICS in two and three reels, and featuring such stars as Marguerite Snow, James Cruze, Flo La Badie, Mignon Anderson, William Russell, Harry Benham, David Thompson, Riley Chamberlin, the Kid and the Kidlet.

Trooper Billy

A Thrilling Western Story in Two Parts

The fame of Frederick Paulding's great play will pack your theatre with those who have seen the stage version and are anxious to view the moving picture adaption.

We've made it better than the play. The climax of this picture is an attack by the Indians upon a stockade. The redmen scaling the walls only to be hurled to the ground, the clash of bodies, the straining and grappling in the desperate hand-to-hand struggles between Indian and Trooper for victory, all go to make one of the most realistic battle scenes ever attempted. Book "Trooper Billy," and your patrons will bear your place in mind as the theatre where good pictures are shown.

Released Wednesday, September 17th

The two Special Kalem One-Sheet Posters and the Special Three and Six-Sheet Posters that go with "Trooper Billy" will draw the crowd to your doors and the money into your box office. "Kalem Posters Outside Mean Larger Crowds Inside."

The Waif

1 reel, Sept. 12

An Exciting Story of a Beautiful Western Girl's Pluck.

Mary Dawson's brother dies suddenly as they are crossing the mountains to join their father. She dons his clothes, feeling a sense of security against the terrible loneliness in the masculine attire. Losing her way, she takes shelter in a miner's cabin. The young prospector finds her asleep. Unknown to her, he senses her sex. Offering her his bed, he throws himself down outside the door for the night. "Bandit Joe," a half-breed, chased by a posse, enters the cabin through the window. Mary grapples with him; he stuns her and escapes. The miner gives chase, followed by Mary. The half-breed wounds Jim, and is rifling his pockets when the waif, using Jim's gun, kills him. The posse carry the miner back to his cabin, where his wound is found trifling. Some time later, when the pretty waif is safe with her father, Jim, who has struck it rich, joins them to claim the plucky girl for his partner.

The Judge's Son

1 reel, Sept. 10

A Western Drama of Human Emotions

Tense Situations. Hand-to-Hand Conflict with Indians. Scenes of Dramatic Climaxes that Grip the Heart.

Cast off by his father for drunkenness and loose living, Jim Burns, son of a Judge and leading citizen, leaves home. Two years elapse, in which he has struck it rich, overcome his evil habits, and is about to return home. The old temptation to gamble seizes him. He loses all, and, accusing the dealer of cheating, engages in a saloon brawl. The gambler is waylaid and murdered by Bud, a hanger-on. Jim is held for the crime, and his own father sits in judgment on him. As the sentence, "Guilty," is pronounced, Bud staggers into court to warn the miners of an Indian outbreak. The redskins are repulsed, and Bud, shot unto death, confesses, clearing the Judge's boy.

Fatty's Day Off

Split Reel Sept. 1

Filled with Laughs and Action.

He takes his girl to the beach, gets "in bad" with two mischievous boys, and they proceed to make the day "enjoyable" for him. After a fruitless chase, in which he loses his breath, not to mention his hat and temper, he seeks quiet in a summer garden. His tormentors tie a string to his rolling chair, and after a wild dash, in which they carry sundry persons and things before them, dump poor Fatty in the lake. With the assistance of the entire police force he is hauled out and sent home, a wetter but wiser man.

Los Angeles Harbor, California

Split Reel Sept. 1

(In Two Acts) For Release Tuesday, September 16

This is not "an ordinary multiple." To so designate a subject of such extraordinary power would be injustice. Negatives made during the most troublesome times in the recent history of Italy are blended into an absorbing story not possible to any other manufacturer here or abroad.

This wonderful story of the betrayal of Nation into War by a wireless government operator contains film of:

1. Battle scenes from the Balkan War.
2. The disappearing 13 inch guns of the great Italian batteries.
3. Scenes from the Opera "Aida" (as per above).
4. The Streets of a Great City swarming with thousands of War-Mad People, with all the attendant excitement of stump orators, fanatics, etc.
5. The complete workings of a Government wireless station.
6. The issuance of the First "War Extra" showing the excitement in the editorial rooms, the feverish haste of compositors in setting the type, the great presses with their human-like arms grinding out the inflammatory news, the newsboys and old women gathering the papers at the circulation entrance and the mobs that fairly tore the papers from their grasp.

About this wealth of film-material made by the famous Cines Co. during the Italian-Turkish and Balkan wars, a delightful story has been woven—the story of a Government wireless operator, who, bribed by bankers speculating for a decline in stock, deliberately changes a message telling of the success of peace negotiations to read the failure of those negotiations and the necessity for War! To follow the son of this wireless operator through the dastardly-made war, to see him die in the thick of battle by the explosion of a bomb, is to realize what the acme of perfection means as applied to multiple reel subjects.

From the famous comedy by Tom Robertson

In Two Parts Released Friday, September 12th

With William West, Mabel Trunnelle, Gertrude McCoy, Bigelow Cooper and other well-known players

TOM ROBERTSON'S famous comedy has held its well-deserved place in popular favor for years. The humor and pathos of the story, the sharply drawn characters, and the swiftly moving incidents make it an ideal photo-play. George D'Alroy, only son of the haughty Marquise de St. Maur, secretly marries Esther Eccles, a dancer. George is ordered to India, and his mother, coming to bid him farewell, discovers Esther and Polly, her sister, in his apartments. George reluctantly introduces his wife, and, before his mother recovers from the shock, old Eccles, a confirmed drunkard, reels in and effusively greets his new-found relative. The poor Marquise and George's chum, Hawtree, receive one shock after another from Eccles until George's reported death from India and and his final return bring about a recognition of his wife.

TWO REEL PICTURE EVERY THURSDAY

"THE HILLS OF STRIFE" Two-Reel Thursday, September 11th

Very dramatic story of the Kentucky mountains.

"The Clod"

Two Reel

Released Thursday, September 18th

A fearfully dramatic incident of the Mexican Revolution. Pedro Mendez, a dense, but powerful, farmer, is asked to join the insurrectos, but really does not know what it means. He is a mere clod, and knows nothing beyond the calls of his simple life. The battles are waged near his farm. Bands of troopers confiscate his horses and cattle. Then they take possession of his house and convert it into a barricade. His wife and crippled mother are killed and the home burned to the ground. His strength then asserts itself, and, seizing a gun, he throws himself into the battle, killing any man in his way, until he himself is shot to pieces.

Facts and Comments

THE present feature service is admittedly in a chaotic state. When we consider that less than two years ago the multiple reel was a decided exception, and contrast this fact with the present state of affairs showing a great majority of fifteen thousand exhibitors using features, no further explanation of the confusion in feature service is necessary. As in the single reel, quality must win out in the feature field. There is much fermentation at present and much wildcat scheming, but crystallization is not far off, and the useless sediment will find its way to the bottom.

In the meantime it is often amusing to watch efforts at producing features with the aid of scissors and an amputated conscience. Recently we saw the remarkable feat of making three reels grow where one reel grew before. The ingenuous author of this "feature" took an old single reel melodrama and cut it up into two parts. He then put a new sub-title on something to this effect: "Our hero is now in Paris." This was followed by a scene showing not only Paris but various other interesting towns, taking up about six hundred feet of film. The action was then continued for awhile, only to be interrupted again with another sub-title, "Our Hero in Rome." This was followed by Roman and Italian scenery generally, and before the end came, three reels of this sort of thing had been inflicted on the audience.

THE Moving Picture World deplores the occasional sneers and slurs which theatrical papers see fit to cast upon all who have entered the moving picture profession by any other than the theatrical route. The exhibiting of moving pictures is a new profession, requiring certain qualifications which are not infrequently possessed by people who have had no career or theatrical experience whatever. The fact that a man before becoming an exhibitor of moving pictures has been a plumber or a tailor may afford amusement to the paragrapher who writes with far more complacency than wit, but it surely does not militate against the success of such an exhibitor's executive ability, good sound judgment of the public taste, attention to details, regard for the rights and comforts of the public. Business ability is often found outside the ranks of theatrical managers and magnates, and we know exhibitors by the score who are very successful in every respect and a credit to the industry but who cannot boast of any previous theatrical experience.

There are hundreds upon hundreds of the smaller cities and towns where a leading moving picture theatre is owned and conducted by a successful business man without previous theatrical experience. We think that this greatly conduces to the wholesome influence which the moving picture exerts; it likewise adds to the esteem of the picture in the minds of the public. While we are on the subject we might add that there are a great many men in the theatrical world today whose beginnings did in no way forshadow their later success. No one thinks of sneering at them, but, on the contrary, we give them credit for rising above their source and conquering the obstacles of their early environment. This, it seems to us, is the American way of looking at things, and to try to belittle a man because he rises to success from a poor start or in spite of handicaps seems to us mighty small business.

EVERY once in a while we hear of a particularly outrageous instance of unwarranted and illegal censorship. We doubt whether the action of the Mayor of Cedar Rapids in Iowa has ever been surpassed for arbitrariness and hopeless stupidity. The chief executive of Cedar Rapids issued a ukase forbidding the exhibition on the screen of such subjects as Quo Vadis and Satan. When the exhibitor ignored the ukase the Mayor without any hearing whatever revoked his license. When the exhibitor entered a most emphatic protest against such high-handed tactics the Mayor invited a number of his friends to a private exhibition and excluded everyone who might be unbiased and fair-minded. The gathering of long-haired men and short-haired women of course agreed with the Mayor, who thereupon considered himself "vindicated" in his snap judgment. The verdict of this packed jury was singular enough: it proclaimed that "'Quo Vadis' and 'Satan' were fine in craftsmanship, but too sensational." If such subjects are sensational, what, in the opinion of the Mayor and the intellectual giants assisting him, will be safe? Sensation is the order of life, and even in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, there must be an occasional sensation. Happily such Mayors as he of Cedar Rapids are few and far between.

A Sermon in Stones

By W. Stephen Bush

THE history of every nation is clearly reflected in its amusements. The state of society in any age may always be safely judged by the character of its amusements. Take, for example, the history of England, from the Tudors to the exile of the last Stuart king. A glance at the dramatic literature of any generation will convince us as to the ascendancy of the Puritan or Cavalier.

It is not too much, then, to say that the nation seeking the morbid in its amusements is doomed to decadence, while, on the other hand, the people whose amusements are clean and healthy are destined to rule others.

Happily, we have standing even at this day the greatest monument of antiquity, bearing eloquent witness to the truth of our assertion. The Coliseum, one of the seven wonders of the world, must convey to every student of human affairs and human events the certain knowledge that no amount of wealth or power can redeem a nation which is given over to inhuman and degrading amusements.

Compared with all and any modern structures devoted to amusements, the Coliseum looms up like a giant among pigmies. It had seats for sixty thousand people. Its arena was large enough to give room for sham battles on either land or sea. Its architectural beauty and perfection even at this day attest the magnificence of ancient civilization.

Seated on a broken column in the arena, one of the greatest of English historians was moved by the wonders round about him to write the history of the decline and fall of the Roman Empire. He could not understand how so much grandeur had passed away, how this noblest monument, made of stone by the hands of man, had come to crumble from its pristine glory into a mass of grass-covered ruins.

The cause of it all was right before him. The most splendid civilization the world had ever known perished because of the morbid cruelty of the people. All those bloody spectacles in the arena continued for centuries, even after the Christian era weakened, and brutalized and made cowards of the people of Rome, who at last fell a prey to the Northern invaders.

The original program for amusements in the Coliseum contemplated no bloody conflicts and no refinements of cruelty. It was intended merely to give lifelike imitations of war and to thrill the spectators with the sight of armed men in seeming combat for life and death. It was not long, however, before these spectacles, exciting as they were, failed to satisfy the populace. The mob began to roar for real blood and for the sight of real human suffering. Wild beasts from every part of the empire were brought into the arena and set to fight each other and fight with human beings. Weak-minded and ambitious emperors, seeking to cater to this growing popular thirst for blood, tried to surpass each other by feeding the mob's morbid instincts and desires. It is calculated that more than a million human beings perished on the bloody sands of this arena, among them thousands of Christians. The thirst for blood began to spread through the empire, and soon every amphitheater from the far East to the plains of Arles resounded with the cries of victims and the savage shouts of the spectators.

As in the body the poison spreads with the blood into every part, even so the greatest civilization built by the hand of man went down in disaster and beyond the possibility of resurrection.

The world has made great progress in the service of humanity since those days, and by slow and painful stages we have arrived at a high state of civilization. The respect for the dignity of man is greater than ever. Our amusements have long ago discarded all elements of inhumanity.

It is gratifying to know that in creating and promoting clean amusements the moving pictures have taken a great and glorious part. There are, it is true, a number of men in the amusement world constantly demanding the ultra-sensational. This, however, is a weak, atavistic echo of the days of the Coliseum. On the whole, it must be admitted that our amusements are at least harmless and often uplifting. The moving picture has made for the advancement of humanity, and has aimed at a higher mark of civilization. This, of course, has been due to the pressure of enlightened public opinion and owing, in some little measure at least, to the constant efforts of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD. This pressure must not be withdrawn. The good fight must be continued. Such things as the portrayal of contemporaneous crime must be resisted without compromise.

Ways and means must be found to make such a degradation of the films a penal offence. Yellow journalism is no excuse for yellow kinematography. It is highly deplorable that men are found who want to make money out of the filming of an escaped lunatic or the trials of "white slavers."

Catering to the morbid instincts which lie dormant in humanity in all ages is a crime against civilization. From this reproach the great producers in this country and abroad have been entirely free. They cannot, however, prevent other men from trying to capitalize crime and filth in moving pictures. Here enters the duty of the exhibitor. If the police cannot stop the exhibition of such films for lack of definite legal power the exhibitor can kill them by refusing them to be shown in his house.

It seems to us that here is a subject which might well engage the attention of the organized exhibitors everywhere. The good name of the moving picture is of the first importance to them; without a good reputation they cannot continue in business. Their emphatic and unanimous declaration on this subject would be a great encouragement to every reputable producer and, indeed, to every friend of the moving picture. It would serve as a warning to all men who might be tempted into giving financial aid to the morbid and unclean film. A feature that cannot be shown cannot be sold, and an argument to the pocketbook is the only kind of argument that the financial supporters of such schemes are able to appreciate. We feel sure that the great majority of exhibitors would co-operate with the legislators in the different States to make the film which obviously caters to depraved tastes an offense against the law.

There are essentials of decency upon which all normal-minded persons will agree naturally. These essentials must be observed all the more carefully in view of the fact that so large a portion of our audiences consist of women and children. Banish the morbid film.

Sir J. Forbes-Robertson, Sir H. Tree, Mr. A. Boucher, Miss Violet Vanbrugh, Mr. Chas. Hawtrey, Mr. Cyril Maude, Mr. G. du Maurier, Mr. Seymour Hicks, Mr. Martin Harvey, Mr. Ed. Payne, and Miss G. Elliott are a few of the most notable idols of the British and American dramatic public who are at present engaged in picture production in the English studios.

"The Wheels of Fate" (Selig).

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE Selig Polyscope Company is to be specially commended for the literary and dramatic merit of the scenarios now being used (and for some time past), in the feature subjects. "The Wheels of Fate," in two reels, to be released September 8, has a particularly strong story. The scenario was written by James Oliver Curwood specially for Mr. Selig. Mr. Curwood is widely known as a writer of fiction, some of his works being "Isobel," published by Harpers, and "The Honor of the Big Snows," "The Courage of Captain Plum," "The Danger Trail," "The Gold Hunters," etc., by the Bobbs Merrill Co., Indianapolis.

"The Wheels of Fate" is a society-domestic photodrama, in which the infelicity of married life ends in tragedy for the wrong doers and in happiness for the wronged—a denouement that leaves a good moral taste in the mental mouth, though it occurs too infrequently in actual life. And this is as it should be, where the treatment of such subjects is based on the viewpoint of a divertisement and not from that of a didactic dissertation.

The author and Director, Oscar Eagle, have worked hand in hand in giving us a clear, well-connected story. With his customary skill and wide-awakeness, Mr. Eagle has succeeded in keeping the spectator in close touch with the thread of the story at all times, and in matters of detail he has been thoroughly observant. In the panic, in mid-Atlantic, where the big steamer is about to sink, the scene is most realistically produced. There is action, action, action, and it is all to the point and in fine control. In the minor scenes, the same careful attention to detail is present. Mr. Eagle is also to be commended on the settings given the principal scenes of these films. The photography is fine.

Moving picture fans will welcome Thomas Carrigan in the role of Philip Wynn. His characterization is marked by fine artistic discrimination, and that leaves little more to be said. Charles Lawler, the villain of the story, is strongly impersonated by Clifford Bruce. One familiar with the sweetness of the disposition and character of Miss Adrienne Kroell in private life will be fairly amazed at the strong contrast of her Mrs. Philip Wynn, the faithless wife in the story. As the "inspiration" girl, Miss Alma Russell is appealingly human.

Philip Wynn, a rising young author and devoted husband, suffers from lack of sympathy in his work by an apathetic wife. She is so bent on pleasure, that she has little time to devote to her husband and his pursuits, and while others sing his praises, she fritters away her time at card parties and in studying bridge whist.

One day he comes to her, glowing with enthusiasm over the success of his new book. She carelessly tosses the book aside, and proceeds with her primping with a bored air. Hurt to the soul, he retires to the solitude of his study and begins a new work, to which he has given the title, "The Inspiration Girl."

But Mrs. Wynn, although repelling her husband, is not without her favorites among the sterner sex. A society man, called Lawler, pays her devoted attention and is always laying his plans for an elopement. The deluded wife is only too glad to listen to his proposals.

In the meantime, the neglected husband seeks the solitude of the forest. In a little cottage in the woods he makes his home, and gives himself up entirely to his new work. In his solitary travels through the woods, seeking inspiration, he meets a young girl and finds in her the ideals that he has ever found lacking in his wife. They become devoted friends, and she takes such interest in his work, that he names her "The Inspiration Girl."

About this time Lawler goes fishing with a friend and it chances that their quarters are near the woods in which Wynn has sought retreat. Lawler is addicted to drinking strong liquor and in one of his bad fits of temper following this weakness, he quarrels with his friend, who leaves him. This friend, on his way through the forest, is seized with thirst and Wynn's cottage appearing close by, he enters and helps himself to water. Lawler, incensed at being overcome by his friend in the fisticuff game, follows him into Philip Wynn's cottage. There the quarrel is renewed, and Lawler shoots his friend with a revolver that he picks up.

Philip Wynn, who had left the cottage some time before on a fishing expedition, finds that he has forgotten his fishing hooks, and returns to get them. He is amazed to find the dead man there, and while puzzling himself over the situation, Lawler, accompanied by the game warden and others, enters the cottage. Lawler accuses Wynn of murder and carries the news to Mrs. Wynn, the fickle wife. Philip is condemned to die in the electric chair, and his wife gets a divorce.

Scenes from Selig's Two-Reel Society-Domestic Photodrama Entitled "The Wheels of Fate."

The closing scenes show Lawler and his newly wed wife on their wedding trip to Europe. In mid-ocean, their ship, the American, collides with another and a fearful panic ensues, the prelude to foundering. Before the ship goes down, Lawler confesses to the captain that he was guilty of the murder of his friend and that Philip Wynn was innocent. The last dispatch sent out by wireless from the ill-fated vessel, carried Lawler's confession to the governor of the state and to the world. Philip was released and found compensation for all his ills in the love and devotion of his new wife, "The Inspiration Girl."

Two Vivid Vitagraphs.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A TERRIFIC train wreck, an actual one, showing the clash of engines, the smashing of machinery, the overturning of coaches, the flare, smoke and grim hideousness of such an accident, from a point of view that must have been extremely perilous for the camera men, is the high value of "The Call," a two-part Vitagraph tragedy. It is brought in to account for the elimination of a married man's individuality, so that his wife may suppose him dead and marry the other fellow. In a story depicting the same situation, "Her Reputation," Beatrice Demarest Lloyed thus describes what happened:

"He could remember the call for help, the eager press forward, the unintelligent effort, the screams, the horrible things they found, the frenzied sobbings of blessings, the unbearable cursing of those who could still curse, the frantic half-blindness in which he worked as one of the ever-thickening mob of creatures which clustered closer and blacker about the unspeakable horror. Into the cool black air the flames leaped with no less crazed appeal than the voices—those voices he would never forget till he was dead, and not then. He was one of a mass of undeservedly tortured humans in hell."

In both screen and printed story the situation is that of a man leaving his wife "for her sake" and preferring to be thought dead that she might enpoy her second choice, but the stories are not the same in preparation, exposition or end. All triangles where there is a husband, wife and trusted ami de la famille, however, look alike to me, and even French people are getting tired of them. The husband who runs away is a weakling; the friend who hangs around to pick up crumbs from the family table is no hero; the adaptable and mercenary wife attracts no sympathy. Perhaps on this account the audience experiences a sense of relief when they are all killed off.

The acting in this drama is admirable, especially that of E. K. Lincoln. His portrayals are those of intelligence. Without violence of movement or facial contortion, without any of the stale tricks used by old theatrical men, he conveys the uppermost sentiment supposed to be in the character's mind during varying situations and moods. He acts as though the director, in this case none other than long-headed Ralph Ince, permitted him to do as he pleased. The interpretation is a fine one, but Ralph Ince deserves something better to interpret. He has not yet reached his great opportunity.

"The Mystery of the Silver Skull," two-part Vitagraph feature, is from a photoplaywright who knows his business, who knows how to construct a drama for the screen, and it is an entertaining story told by a powerful cast. The acting is absolutely without flaw, and the story is so entertaining that it will hold attention, but it is based on the fatality attached to an inanimate object, in this case a tiny silver skull, and both playwright and director should exercise care in showing that the little demon is directly responsible for both the climax and what leads to it.

The drama is put together correctly, but its form is more that of the stage than of the ordinary photoplay—incidents of the past are brought into present action by narrative, in order to preserve suspense. To illustrate my point I may be permitted to outline the story.

A young ship owner, Costello, rather fond of his piratical-looking skipper, Lytton, calls at an office in New York to conclude a deal with an amiable miser. He returns suddenly after the interview and catches an attractive girl attempting to abstract papers from the safe. The miser has a hold on her father and seeks her hand in marriage as the price of silence. During the interesting scene that follows in the miser's office between the girl and the young ship owner, he picks up a little silver skull and takes it with him when they escape. He follows up the adventure and hears from the girl's lips that her father murdered an unknown man at a game of cards before two witnesses, one of them the miser, the other a ship's officer.

The murder was ascribed to the girl's father, then too drunk to know what had happened, whereas it was really committed by the miser. The piratical-looking skipper alone knows that the girl's father was innocent. In the natural course of events the skipper sees the silver skull, in evidence when the murder was committed, and he appears at an acute moment to right the wrong he has compounded for years. The mere sight of the watch charm, while it might have recalled the murder, does not seem to be strong enough incentive for him to confess his inactive but criminal complicity. A powerful scene would have been his gradual yielding to the pleadings of the young ship owner, his noble motive being to preserve the girl from an unhappy fate at the risk of being punished for the part he played as accomplice.

I refer to this as the natural and logical development of what is in all other respects a very good story. It is almost an obligatory scene. This is a play of high tension, and a great deal more is imposed upon the dramatist in such a case than in a simpler form of story. The instincts of the modern audience are keenly alert, and the playwright must give adequate justification for setting in motion characters actuated by differing motives to arrive at an exact moment of high pressure. We must consider that miracles are no longer excusable, because the photoplay gives much more time for careful preparation than a drama for stage performance.

I have already referred to the acting—that of old Vitagraph favorites is delightful in this piece—but I failed to get the cast and can name neither the lady nor the miser, to whom go the honors of splendid performances in this photodrama. Both contributed heavily to intensifying interest in the presentation. The tout ensemble is creditable to author, director and performer, the triangle that must have its proportions nicely balanced in order that the whole play may succeed.

"The Betrothed"

Six-Reel Ambrosio Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IN an article printed in the Moving Picture World of September 5th, 1908, I spoke of Manzoni's famous novel, "The Betrothed," as "A great opportunity for an enterprising maker of films." I felt so strong on the subject that I added, "I recommend to all of them to read the story. Its dramatization in moving pictures will not be easy, but it would make us laugh and weep, then laugh again and weep again and make us all feel glad that we are living."

I therefore felt a sense of just gratification when I heard that the filming of this splendid story had been done by such a competent filmer of classic subjects as the Ambrosio Company has proven itself to be. The difficulties of filming such a story cannot be exaggerated, and no amount of human art will ever succeed in transferring to the screen a notion of the power of Manzoni's pen. His mastery of language, his ability to mix humor and pathos, his kindly outlook upon life, his love of what is good and his hatred of what is bad cannot be known in any other way than by reading the book.

Scene from "The Betrothed" (Ambrosio).

There are, however, running all through the story of "The Betrothed," valuable dramatic materials which lend themselves very readily to filming. A great temptation to the producer is to yield to the charm of Manzoni's name and thus try to make the moving picture tell too much at once. I cannot absolve the Ambrosio Company from the blame of having yielded here and there to this temptation.

With this single exception, however, this filmed version of the world's greatest novel deserves unstinted praise. Something of the charm of Manzoni's genius gets on the screen and casts a spell on the spectator. It is very evident that this was a labor of love with the Ambrosio Company. To begin with, they have gone to the trouble of taking various scenes of the story on the very spots where Manzoni has located them, and we get glimpses of Lake Como set like a gem in one of the most beautiful landscapes of the world. The charm in the story lies in the fact that it deals with the adventures of a young couple from the ranks of the plain people of Italy. Their simple honesty is set in striking contrast with the corruption and magnificence of the noble rulers of the country. No one has ever told of the struggles of the poor against the intrigue and insolence of the rich with greater and more convincing eloquence than Manzoni. No one ever understood the human heart better than he. The scenes in which he shows how even an old man hardened by long years of crime may at the last feel penitence and remorse and find happiness in doing good, has brought tears to the eyes of most readers of the book. In the film the scene perhaps is a bit too hurried, but enough is shown to touch the spectator.

Scene from "The Betrothed" (Ambrosio).

The producer has improved to the utmost every opportunity for spectacular work. The insurrection and the bread riots in Milan and later the fearful scenes in the deserted streets when the plague swept over the city, are portrayed with imposing skill and fidelity to life and history.

"The Betrothed," by the Ambrosio Company is entirely worthy to be enrolled in the list of the world's moving picture classics.

CHARLEY CHAPMAN'S BIRTHDAY.

Charles Chapman celebrated his birthday on August 12. He astonished the whole Vitagraph studio by decking himself in his glad rags and going home two hours earlier than usual. Mr. Chapman, who is the scenic expert, has never before been seen at the plant in anything but his working clothes, and has never been known to be away from his duties, not even for a moment, before this eventful day. His age, proponent sayeth not. During the summer he occupies a bungalow at Rockaway Point, going back and forth from business every day. It is filled with many curios and beautiful works of art. One of his latest notions was the purchase of seven or eight suckling pigs. One morning about four o'clock, they set up such a squeal, he was obliged to get up in his nightie and give them the bottle, with which he had provided himself for such an emergency. We regret that we cannot furnish pictures of this event. Chap is some figure. Yes, and some worker too. He sets up the sets and knocks them down again like ninepins in a bowling alley.

A VITAGRAPH COMEDY EVERY FRIDAY.

For some time past, requests have been received by the Vitagraph Company to establish a Vitagraph comedy release day. Hereafter, beginning Friday, September 5th, the Vitagraph Company will release one of its comedies every Friday.

A Brace of Interesting Edisons

"Caste" and "The Green Eye of the Yellow God."

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

NOT within my memory has "Caste" been shown as a screen production, and it is remarkable as well as pleasant that it should remain for the Edison studio to release this well-constructed stage play for presentation in motion pictures. The germ of the play is probably set down as "fond hearts versus coronets," but it has deeper currents than those easiest named. It is ostensibly the old story of a gentleman of good family and social position "marrying down" from the point of view of his friends, though the girl be the fittest mate he could select. Her personality is not so offensive in such alliances as the habits and conduct of her relatives and associates. The father of the girl in this case might have been regarded as a comical old sot, but his degradation is so complete—he is a greedy and greasy soak—that his children are badly handicapped in any attempt to rise above their initial standpoint.

Scene from "Caste" (Edison).

Gertrude McCoy, as the girl, engages sympathy for the role in her serious acceptance of its responsibilities, but she is crude in her movements at times—they do not seem to proceed from her own consciousness as much as from exterior suggestion. Upon receiving bad news a woman does not instantly slam her face on her arm and sob convulsively—it takes time for her to fully realize a great misfortune—it is stunning in its effect. Miss McCoy wins on a very engaging personality of her own when she does not attempt to do what she does not naturally feel. She is admirable in the situations that are really affecting, doing as well as the rest of the splendid body of actors gathered together in this strong photodrama. Gertrude McCoy, Mabel Trunnelle, Mrs. C. Jay Williams, William West, Richard Tucker, Bigelow Cooper and Barry O'Moore form one of the best balanced companies for work of this kind that I have seen grouped in one production during the past year or two. It would seem as though nothing more was to be desired in any part. Of those unremarked in previous Edison releases I was most pleased with the quiet and thoroughly consistent work of Mr. Tucker. There was nothing theatrical about his impersonation, and it was none the less effective on that account. I give prominence to the interpreters of this well-known play because of their efforts to carry it over in masterly fashion, and I do not omit the baby boy. He seemed almost conscious of what was required of him, actually played his tiny part to perfection. Director Williams, long engaged on split-reel comedies, has shown that he can put over a big play when he has the material. He has made a decided success of this one.

Scene from "The Green Eye of the Yellow God" (Edison).

"The Green Eye of the Yellow God" is completely dominated by Charles Ogle. He was a great surprise to me in the youthful role of Lieutenant Carew, a devil-may-care British officer in the East Indian service, a transformed Charles Ogle of many lofty villainies. He impersonates a young man of great natural courage challenged by a woman to gratify a passing caprice for the unattainable. When he asks her what she would like for a birthday present—the anniversary is to be celebrated by a ball in her honor—she mentions the "Green Eye," a priceless jewel in the eye of an Indian idol, and adds, "Of course, I really don't want it, but you would not get it for me if I did—would you?" He takes the challenge seriously, wrests the jewel from its socket, fights his way out of the temple, is desperately wounded, rides in a dazed condition to the ball, delivers the evidence of his reckless bravery and dies in the presence of the woman who sorely tested his love. The jewel is almost immediately recovered by an under priest who has followed the daring officer, and nothing but remorse remains for the woman who sacrificed a splendid fellow on her altar of vanity.

"He had loved her all along
With the passion of the strong."
She loved him when it was all too late.
"There's a one-eyed yellow idol to the north of Khatmandu,
There's a little marble cross below the town;
A broken-hearted woman tends the grave of Mad Carew,
And the yellow god forever gazes down."

The immortality of the material is strongly suggested in contrast with the mortality of those who build idols and ideals from base clay.

There are some beautiful scenes in the play, some new and highly artistic effects. Most noteworthy of these is the darkened view of the club house piazza during the height of the ball with a glimpse through the windows of a brilliant interior, the scene of the ball. Not only are the contrasts thus presented very effective, but the picture is one to hold the eye and remain in the mind. The conclusion of the tragedy is perfect.

ST. LOUIS MOTION PICTURE CO. BUYS MELIES PLANT AT SANTA PAULA.

On a recent visit to California, O. E. Goebel, president of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, made a trip to Santa Paula to look over the property of the Melies Company, with a view to purchase. Satisfied with the plant and location he bought the property, as for sometime he has been seeking a California location to stage the popular Frontier films.

Considerable additions will be made. Plans are being drawn for the erection of a large glass studio at a cost of $25,000, and, when finished, the plant will be one of the best equipped in the country.

W. L. Robards, formerly with the Universal, Lubin and Melies companies has been engaged as an addition to the producing staff at Santa Paula. The company will be augmented from Los Angeles and no expense is to be spared in putting on productions that will further the popularity of Frontier films.

CINES ACTOR IS KILLED BY MADDENED BULL.

G. Geisha, a Spanish actor brought to Rome by the Cines Company to be used in a series of Spanish plays, was killed recently by a maddened bull in rehearsing a scene from "For the Love of a Toreador," a coming Cines picture. Geisha was a professional bull fighter and was hired especially to play the lead in that picture. This is the first accident of consequence that has befallen any member of the Cines Company in its history.

Motion Pictures Ridiculed on Stage.

Broadway Farce Seeks to Redeem the Waning Glory of the Stage by Affront—Miss Briscoe Serves Injunction.

THERE opened in New York City on the evening of August 25, at the Forty-eighth Street Theater an alleged comedy by one Phillip Bartholomae entitled, "Kiss Me Quick." It seems that the author has depended principally for his comedy upon the amount of ridicule he could derive from the making of motion pictures, principally the actors. It is said that instead of being humorous the piece is actually venomous and is a good revelation of the resentment that is harbored by non-progressive theatrical men against the ever-growing and popular motion picture. The play, if it can be so called, deals directly with studio work of motion picture making. It endeavors to create the idea that photoplayers as a class are a set of illiterate, uncouth and unintelligent persons. The characters are exaggerated much in the same manner that it is customary to exaggerate the grossness of circus people when they are put into novels or on the stage, regardless of actual conditions.

This in itself would be bad enough, but the management of this production has seen fit to utilize the name of a well-known leading woman, Miss Lottie Briscoe, of the Lubin Company, as one of the histrionic incompetents typified in the play. It is said that there is a rehearsal scene in which is brought out the alleged fact that while motion picture actors may be able to convey thoughts and ideas before the camera they are totally incompetent and inadequate when it comes to "real acting." Miss Briscoe came over to New York from Philadelphia to witness the opening of the play and was surprised to find her name on the program as that of one of the boorish characters. She went at once to the manager and demanded that her name be removed from the program. This he refused to do, saying that it furnished good advertising. From this it is evident that the management is courting a lawsuit over this matter for the mere sake of what publicity it will bring. At any rate Miss Briscoe got in touch with her attorney, Mr. Guy Murray, of 64 Wall Street, and injunction papers were served upon the management of the company and the theater, restraining them from using Miss Briscoe's name in connection with the piece. The case will be heard August 29, in Supreme Court, Part Two, before Judge Whittaker. Miss Briscoe feels that it is necessary to take these proceedings, not only on her own account, but in behalf of the vast number of reputable motion picture actors who, as everybody knows, have been for the most part recruited from the ranks of the legitimate stage, including some of the most illustrious personages that the drama has ever known.

One incident that detracts from Miss Briscoe's credit in this matter is her inspired presence on the opening night. This makes it evident that she knew all about it in advance, and if that is the case the whole thing is nothing but a cheap advertising scheme on both sides of the case.

In response to inquiries it is difficult to find anyone who ever heard of the author, Phillip Bartholomae; but whoever he is his play seems to be a cynical outburst against an art that will nevertheless continue to manifest itself with increasing force and will crowd the disgruntled witch-finders entirely out of the business in due course of time. It is probable also that the art of writing photoplays has encroached considerably upon Mr. Bartholomae's field and that he finds himself confronted with the alternative of becoming either a photoplaywright, or crying "wolf" to call attention to the decadence of his ebbing vocation. His sentiments as embodied in his splenetic spasm remind one of those Chinese who beat on gongs and make loud noises to scare away evil spirits.

The chances are that the promoters of this fiasco are anxiously anticipating a storm of indignation on the part of photoplay fans, all of which will be valuable advertising.

That being the case, it hardly behooves anyone to get worked up over the thing. The awful "panning" that "Kiss Me Quick" got from the New York dallies will kill it quickly enough. One critic said that the title should have been "Kill Me Quick."

GAUMONT NEW CITY OFFICES.

The Gaumont Company, of Flushing, Long Island, feeling the need of central offices, has taken a large suite at 1503 World's Tower Building, located at 110 West 40th Street, New York. One of the features of the new quarters will be a fully equipped up-to-date projection room in which to exhibit the well known Gaumont product.

"The Thrust of Hate" (Eclectic).

By George Blaisdell.

THE Eclectic Film Company will release on September 1 a three-part hand-colored picture that is worth going a distance to see. It is straight drama, embellished with a sword fight in which the participants show marvelous skill. "The Thrust of Hate" will easily stand all tests by which a picture is judged. The story is good—but in its working out there is such fine quality of acting, such real artistry, that it will closely hold all the way by reason of its treatment alone. The photography in the sample print which was shown—and this one was in black and white—is excellent, all that is to be desired. The settings are charming. The exteriors show the luxuriant foliage of the country bordering on the Mediterranean. The structures are those of people of means, harmonizing with the station in life of the principal characters. The interiors are elaborate, such as all persons, whatever their success or non-success in the world's battle, enjoy seeing on the screen. The direction is of the best.

The story is of an artist, in love with his subject, the daughter of a duchess. The two have come to an understanding. The mother is in financial difficulties and goes to her banker, seeking a third mortgage on her property. The banker, visiting the duchess, sees the daughter. Deeply impressed, he writes the mother asking permission to call and press his suit for her daughter's hand. The mother consents to receive him and later sanctions his proposal. She oversees the daughter and the artist in the conservatory. It is a clandestine visit. The mother upbraids the girl, tells her of the engagement for her she has entered into, and then notifies the artist of the situation. The marriage takes place. On the return from the honeymoon the banker sends to his fencing club a challange for a bout. The artist, a member of the club, a former friend of the banker, is prevailed upon to meet the banker. The meeting is the occasion for a festival and a large company is assembled. Both men are experts and evenly matched. As the contestants change positions the artist, realizing the man opposing him has won the woman on whom he had set his heart, deftly removes the button that guards the point of his sword. When the bout is renewed the banker falls, pierced in the heart. The referee picks up the weapon of the artist, discovers the naked point, and leads away the artist. The wife, in an adjoining room, sees the body of her husband. She leans against a pillar; she does not approach the body. The picture fades.

One of the strongest scenes is where the mother, after the discovery of the two lovers in the conservatory, takes the girl into the house and informs her of the love of the banker and of the fact that the family is bankrupt. Another is the farewell of the two lovers. The contest in the fencing club, as friendly a one on the part of the banker as it is deadly on the part of the jealous artist, makes a spectacle sufficient in itself to put over any single reel. Reference has been made to the acting. It may be unfair to single out any one of the players. The writer cannot forego calling attention to the splendid work of the man who plays the banker. It is unusual.

The conclusion of the picture will undoubtedly be the cause of many a controversy. Which contestant in the sword fight did the wife favor? Had she, as has been known to be the case, really fallen in love with her husband? She did not go to him; neither did she go to the artist. It is safe to say the conclusion of the picture will be marked by a buzz of conversation in every house.

JOHN BUNNY TO BE KING OF MARDI GRAS.

The business men of Coney Island, New York, have selected Mr. John Bunny, the world-famous Vitagraph comedian, to be king of the Mardi Gras of 1913, which will be held for one week beginning Sunday, September 7. Having the power to choose the woman who will act as queen, Mr. Bunny promptly selected Miss Lillian Walker, the justly renowned Vitagraph beauty. On the opening day of the Mardi Gras the king and queen will be crowned in high state at Luna Park, and for a week they will reign together over the kingdom of fun. There is no doubt that Mr. Bunny and Miss Walker will fill the bill beyond precedent. They will in all probability prove to be wonderful drawing cards for the big show, to say nothing of the incidental publicity they will bring to the Vitagraph Company.

CHICAGO LETTER

By JAS. S. McQUADE

THE members of the Chicago branch of the International Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association have been hard at work for the past three weeks endeavoring to bring about in this city the adoption by exhibitors of a three-reel program for five cents and a five-reel program for 10 cents. This subject was thoroughly discussed at the last regular meeting of the organization, in their hall, in Masonic Temple, and another meeting was held shortly afterward, in the same place, at which the General Film Co., the Mutual Film Corporation and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company were represented by their local exchange managers. Another meeting was held a few days later, at which the exchange managers of the various feature film companies and the exhibitors met in friendly session.

Sidney Smith, secretary of the association, states that very encouraging progress has been made among exhibitors and that all exchange representatives have signified their willingness to cô-operate. It will take time and some patience to effect the change, he declares, but he is optimistic on the outcome. A drawback to a complete observance of the rules at the outset arises from the fact that several of the feature film exchanges have outstanding contracts with some exhibitors in certain districts, but the plan is looked upon favorably by all film renters.

Some owners of theaters with balconies are contending that, where five reels are offered for 10 cents admission, the balcony seats should be held at five cents. It is shown, however, that this ruling would work hardship on a nearby competitor whose house has no balcony and who charges 10 cents, experience having proved that he will lose patrons, as the latter will take advantage of the five cent seats in the competing house. Children under 10 years of age will be admitted to 10 cent theaters at half price.

The ruinous competition at present existing in Chicago, in the exhibition business, cannot come to an ending too soon. Average intelligence is sufficient to show the present owners and managers of picture theaters that they are practically eating one another up by pursuing the present policy. They should remember one truth, however; when they have finished eating one another, the business will be continued on a higher and saner plane by wiser business men, who will estimate moving picture entertainment at its true value and follow the motto, "Live and let live."

"Les Miserables" of Remarkable Excellence.

There was little time to herald the first presentation of "Les Miserables" at Orchestra Hall in the daily press of this city, and an additional drawback lies in the fact that the opening of the dramatic season was right at hand. Notwithstanding these heavy handicaps, the great photodrama has made fine headway, and the business has increased steadily through its commanding artistic merit. How appealing that merit is can be gleaned from the following criticism in the Chicago News, of August 25, the opinion of its managing editor:

> One of those motion picture masterpieces that Europe loves and that America often undervalues is now on view at Orchestra Hall. It is Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables," done into a film drama of remarkable excellence. The story of Jean Valjean, of Javert, of Fantine, of Marius and Cosette, which Hugo told in five chief divisions, is here presented in nine reels. The performance lasts two and a half hours, but it does not seem overlong.
> France evidently was ransacked for actors to fit the roles. In the character of Valjean, M. Henri Krauss, of the Theater Sarah Bernhardt, appears to great advantage. His physique, as well as his genius as an actor, enables him to enact a part beyond the capacity of the ordinary man.
> Ordinary "stage business" of the "movies" is laid aside in favor of acting such as one has seen in the productions of Bernhardt, Irving and Mansfield. A turn of the head, a shrug, a movement of the lips, serve in this Hugo piece the same ends that exaggerated postures and mechanical devices attain in the ordinary picture play. It is noteworthy that not one of the many letters and documents introduced is thrown on the screen, nor needs to be. There is, of course, an explanation of each scene, but a person familiar with the story could almost do without the explanations. The interplay of character, the spiritual progress or degeneration of each individual, thousands of delicate emotional reactions, are as clear as they are in the novel itself.
> In selecting material the authors have made some departures from the original. For example, they cause Valjean to steal a loaf for his sick mother instead of for the seven children of his sister. But, for the most part, the film drama adheres closely to the Hugo text. The episode of the bishop's candlesticks, the incidents in Valjean's career as M. Madeline, his flight with Cosette, the intrigues of the Thenardiers, Marius' courtship of Cosette, and the scenes of the rebellion of 1832 are given with fidelity. Glimpses of old Paris and beautiful rural scenes will delight people who have seen France.
> Selections on the great organ are given by Robert Stronach and W. F. McCarrell.

William Sievers, secretary and treasurer of the Rex Amusement Co., St. Louis, and general manager of the New Grand Central Theater, that city, is attending to the booking of the Illinois state rights, and to the presentations at Orchestra Hall. Rochford and Oak Park have already been booked.

Buffalo Bill To Live In Pictures.

H. Tammen and F. J. Bonfils, proprietors of the Denver Post and of the Sells-Floto shows, have arranged to engage in the manufacture of moving pictures. On Thursday, August 21, at Denver, they purchased all the best animals and equipment of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show, the sale of all the belongings of the historic organization being held on that date.

Fifty thousand dollars was immediately set aside for the production of the first of a series of multiple feature reels, in which the early life of Buffalo Bill, the scout and soldier, will be closely and truthfully followed in pictures, he himself to appear as the principal figure. It is said that Indians and soldiers will be massed in great numbers in these pictures, and that early frontier life will be realistically portrayed. A studio for the production of interior scenes will soon be erected in Denver, according to reliable information.

M. P. Operator Killed in Chicago.

Joseph Lavelle, operator in the Langley Theater, Langley Avenue and Sixty-third Street, grasped a live wire and was killed Thursday night, August 21, in the presence of 1,000 persons, and was held by the current for half an hour until firemen cut the wires and dragged his body out with pike poles. When he grasped the wire with his bare hands there was a blinding flash and a scream that brought the people to their feet, but the fireman and policeman of the Woodlawn station on duty there, and the ushers, quieted the audience so that there was no panic and no person was hurt.

A fuse blew out when lightning, during a terrific electric storm, struck the wires, plunging the house into darkness. Lavelle, knowing nothing of the storm outside, thought that some one had merely thrown the switch and began fumbling in the dark to turn the lights on again. In his confusion he grasped a live wire and completed the fatal circuit.

When he was carried outside, with the horrified audience gathered around in the rain, surgeons worked over him with a pulmotor for an hour. At the end of that time they placed him in an ambulance and took him to the Washington Park Hospital. There it was declared that death had been instantaneous.

Moving Pictures Teach R. R. Employees How To Handle Explosives.

Colonel B. W. Dunn, chief inspector of the bureau of explosives of the American Railway Association presided at the twenty-second annual convention of members of the American Association of Railroad Superintendents, in Chicago last week. In a special room at the Hotel Sherman, he arranged for the presentation of a series of moving pictures to accompany his address, the object being educational and especially referring to the handling of explosives while in transit.

The first picture was "The Tragedy of Three Careless Men," in which the first careless man was seen pouring gasoline into a leaking receptacle. Careless man number two, representing the railroad, received the goods for transportation without noticing the leak. The third careless man smoked his pipe near the leaking can, which resulted in an explosion and a big fire. Another picture treated of the gross carelessness of workmen in handling explosives, with consequent explosions and loss of life.

"This is a new adventure in the activities of the bureau of explosives," Col. Dunn said. "If it is approved, we hope to make use of it in our educational work—that of instructing shippers of explosives and inflammable material and the employees of railroads as to the necessary precaution and care in handling such goods.

"In 1907 the loss by fire due to accidents in transporting explosives was $500,000. Last year the loss was $30,000. In 1907 fifty-two lives were lost in such accidents. There were no lives lost in such manner last year."

Misinformation Exposed.

Paul De Outo, who owns the state rights in Illinois and Wisconsin for the three-reel "Quo Vadis?" called at the World office Saturday, August 23. Mr. De Outo drew attention to a letter written by Liman C. Mann, a moving picture lecturer, which appeared in the Moving Picture World, in the issue of August 9.

"Mr. Mann was not engaged by me to lecture 'Quo Vadis?' in East St. Louis, that is positive," said Mr. De Outo. "Mr. Comer, my advance man, wrote me a letter recommending Mr. Mann as a good lecturer, and on July 22 I wrote Mr. Redmon of the Airdome, East St. Louis, to the effect that I did not think it would pay to get a lecture up and besides, that the pictures did not require a lecture."

"I have Mr. Comer's letter to Mr. De Outo and Mr. De Outo's letter to Mr. Redmon before me at this writing, and am satisfied that Mr. Mann misinformed me as to his being engaged by Mr. De Outo to lecture on the three-reel 'Quo Vadis?' "

H. D. Koffman, owner of the Humboldt and Liberty Theaters, Chicago, is associated with Mr. De Outo in the state rights for the films mentioned.

Chicago Film Brevities.

Frank T. Montgomery, the well known exhibitor of the south, spent several days in Chicago last week, making his headquarters at the La Salle Hotel. Mr. Montgomery made the rounds of the trade during his stay. He also paid a visit to the World office.

WEBER AND FIELDS IN PICTURES.

Will Appear in Photo-comedies.

The first production of the new Weber & Fields subsidiary Kinemacolor Company will be a big spectacular humorous Kinemacolor special five reel feature that it is the present intention to title Weber & Fields In "Meyer and Mike Around the World."

An entirely new theme will be the background of all the famous Weber & Fields comedy hits. A capable cast of well known players will support the noted comedians, and a large army of show girls and supernumeraries will be employed in many of the scenes.

The motion picture arrangement of this big production will be by Mr. Roy L. McCardell, the humorist and writer, who is an experienced photoplaywright of some fourteen years standing. Mr. McCardell, whose work for the Biograph, Kalem and Vitagraph is well known to moving picture audiences, has recently contracted with the Selig Polyscope Company to do a series of wild animal comedies with nursery rhyme "leaders" or readers, a distinct novelty originated by Mr. William Selig, who selected Mr. McCardell as his photoplaywright. The first scenarios of these motion picture animal comedies have been delivered, and their taking is now being arranged for at the Selig animal ranch near Los Angeles.

CHESTER BEECROFT WITH GENERAL FILM.

On Tuesday, September 1, Mr. Chester Beecroft, the well known New York journalist and publicity man, will take up his new duties as manager of publicity and advertising with the General Film Company at 200 Fifth Avenue, New York. For the past two years Mr. Beecroft has been manager of the New York office of the Billboard, in which position he gained an experience and acquaintance that extends over the entire theatrical and film fields. Prior to his connection with the Billboard Mr. Beecroft occupied the position of advertising manager of the Motion Picture Patents Company in the early years of its existence.

CANCELLATION OF ADVERTISEMENT.

Since our last week's issue, we have learned that the advertisement on page 991, entitled "Five Prizes in Film Competition," is contrary to postal regulations. We therefore have cancelled same and will return all replies. We regret very much that the advertisement appeared under the circumstances and that many of our readers took the time and trouble to prepare replies. Needless to say, we had no intention of doing anything contrary to regulations of the United States Postal Department.

Ivanhoe

Three-Reel Universal Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

An earnest and ambitious effort to film high class popular fiction of the type of Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, deserves the hearty commendation of every friend of moving pictures. Even if the production resulting from such an effort was feeble and imperfect, harsh criticism would be out of place. Happily, the film rendering of Ivanhoe, by the Universal Film Company, does not stand in need of any indulgence but is, on the contrary, entitled to sincere praise purely on its merits. The director has evidently grown with his task and there is plenty of evidence all through this feature, that care, and time, and patience, and skill entered into the production. In this film, the Universal Film Company have aimed higher than usual and I am glad to say that their mark is close to the center of the target.

Scene from "Ivanhoe" (Imp).

It is in altogether a tolerant and friendly spirit and with a helpful purpose that I venture to point out what appeared to me to be some of the minor defects in the production. I would not care to even mention these defects were it not that they could have easily been avoided and that this warning may serve to prevent a repetition. While the titles as a whole are quite acceptable, I was astonished to find that fierce Norman warrior, Brian de Bois Guilbert turned into a Celtic "Sir Bryan." I did not like the French heels on Lady Rowena and Rebecca, nor could I reconcile myself to the German military moustaches on Brian de Bois and Front de Boeuf. The military operations about the castle are at times confusing and it is not always easy to tell who are the besiegers and who are the besieged. The famous scene, "Trial by Combat," where Ivanhoe appears as Rebecca's champion to save her from being burned as a witch, would seem to stand in need of some explanatory sub-titles. I think, too, that the movements of the mob gave one the undesirable impression of long and painful drills before the camera, though most moving picture audiences will be quite ready to overlook this last blemish.

Scene from "Ivanhoe" (Imp).

I would not do this production justice if I did not mention two great points of merit, one the splendid acting of the principal characters and the other the magnificence of the settings.

Moving Picture Educator

THE PLACE AND VALUE OF THE EDUCATIONAL PICTURE IN THE MOVING PICTURE BUSINESS.

HAS the educational picture had any effect upon the general business of the moving pictures? This is a question of vital importance, because whatever effect has been experienced in the past, will have a great influence on the future life and character of the moving picture business. The writer ventures to affirm—with more certainty than boldness—that the present commercial and moral standing of the picture business is due in the larger measure to the educational picture than to any other one cause. That there be no misunderstanding let it be distinctly understood that this is not a revival of the subject of the moral effect of the picture either upon sentiment or public opinion; but rather the general effect upon every aspect of the commercial side of the whole picture business. The present standing of the moving picture, both in manufacturing and exhibiting, is high, very high as compared to five years ago; to what cause may this be attributed? Undoubtedly to the large field of educationalism which seemed naturally to open up before all who were interested in kinematography, and which has proved eminently successful to all those embracing the opportunities thus presented. That there are those who have not followed this higher trend there can be little doubt, otherwise there could not exist the sensational picture, with its yellow tinge; perhaps with pictures as with newspapers, there must be the yellow streak to meet the one so pronounced in some natures, until that nature is cultured above itself.

The Lost Lure of the Picture.

A proof of this educated advance is that the pictures have lost much of that old and unhealthy alluring nature which they formerly unfortunately "enjoyed." In those alluring days it was only a question of pictures, not what kind, or how good or how bad, simply pictures, so long as they were moving pictures, that was all they asked for. From this unhealthy state of things sprang all kinds of censorship and prohibitions; children must be protected, and even some adults must be protected against themselves, to say nothing of the need of forcing some exhibitors—and occasionally a maker—to come within the bounds of propriety. In some centers such as the crowded parts of the cities, or in places where the crowds gathered like Coney Island, this "lure" was both pronounced and strong if not dangerous. Happily this is now very largely a "lost lure." no longer does a simple picture allure, and the flaming poster has lost much of its old power. Before going to a picture place now people invariably want to know what they are going to see, its nature, value and power. What has brought about this change if it be not the educationalism with which the pictures of the last few years have been saturated? Having tasted the worth and beauties of the class of pictures which have been drawn from that which was best and "worth while" the public taste has been spoiled for that which is without merit and cultureless, not because of a cultured discrimination, but rather because of the keen perception which readily distinguishes between that which in itself proves more worthy.

Educationalism in the Picture Has Been Commercially Successful.

Thus has the educationalism in the picture lifted the thought and experience of the people; it might also be said at this time, that this also applies to the music for the picture as to the picture itself. Better scenarios are now written because of the campaign of education carried on by such men as Epes Winthrop Sergent. Better acting results from the fact that now no actor of greatest fame thinks himself too big to enter the field of the silent drama; and again in turn the manufacturers realize that there is nothing too good for either themselves, the exhibitors or the public.

If then this spirit of educationalism has so raised the standard all along the line, how much more has the distinctly educational picture figured in this progress? The educational picture enlisted the interest and support of educators of the world; these were quickly followed by all classes of people upon whom education has an influence.

Commercially It Pays.

No one goes in business except for profit, that which pays must prevail. When the poorer and questionable prevailed they paid; when these passed away and this higher order of things took its place it also was made to pay.

Now, therefore, there is only one outlook in the whole realm of the moving picture world commercially as well as morally, and that lies first in the educational picture, and in the second place the general spirit of educationalism in all pictures, so long as these prevail, and as their scope is unending, so the future of the picture in all its parts, relative to human society, will continue its upward course and its standard will remain; while commercial prosperity is also maintained.

THE NEW NAME.

Apropos of the suggested new name which shall comprehend and designate the full purpose of the moving picture and picture houses, instead of the numerous and varied mis-nomers of the present time; many readers may recall that the Educator has at various times encouraged the discussion of this topic. Agreeably with this suggestion we publish a letter received from Mr. John C. MacKenzie, of Seaforth, Ontario, Canada:

"Moved by a paragraph written by W. H. J. in a recent issue of the Educator, in which he urges the necessity of a new name to designate our industry, I am going to make a suggestion. The field of the common noun and its derivatives seems to have been searched in vain, and, as the motion picture is pre-eminently a twentieth century product, I prefer to let the dead languages remain dead, so far as we are concerned. Thus the thought has struck me: Why not give the name of some man who has done something to make our art possible a place? This put me in a big field and, of course, opened ground for controversy, but after summing it up to the extent of my limited knowledge, it seems to me that Lumiere was the first to project a picture—the projected picture is Lumiere's achievement. (I do not know to what extent this statement would have to be qualified, speaking strictly.) The first picture thus shown being Lumiere's pictures, why not call all such pictures Lumieres? The word is neither cumbersome or undignified, and is easily remembered. I might cite other reasons which would apply in Europe as well as here in its similarity to 'luminous' or 'luminaire,' etc., which my dictionary tells me means 'any body that gives light'—'a person that lightens the world.' That comes pretty close to what we are trying to do."

It is a pleasure to publish Mr. MacKenzie's letter. At this time we will make no further comment, except to say that we do not agree with the suggesions to discard the dead languages; may we hear from others on this important subject.

AN AUSPICIOUS PITTSBURGH OPENING.

Messers. Dershimer & Grelle who recently purchased Pennsylvania state rights on Kalem's Biblical Masterpiece "From the Manger to the Cross," opened, with the picture, in Pittsburgh at the Liberty Theater, Pittsburgh's newest Play-House on August 11th, for an indefinite engagement. The attendance has far exceeded their expectations and comments from the clergy, press and public have been very gratifying.

A booking office has been opened at 406 Cameraphone Bldg., 5th Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

LAURANCE GOES TO WARNER.

W. H. Laurance, who has been manager of Union Features for the past few months, leaves that company on September 1st to take charge of the Indianapolis office of Warner's Features, Inc. Mr. Laurance is a fully experienced film man, having been in the business for the past seven years.

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT NEFF AND HIS REPLY.

THIS office is in receipt of copies of letters from E. E. Fulton, a supply dealer of Chicago, and President Neff of the M. P. E. L. of A. As both letters are somewhat lengthy we do not deem it necessary to publish them in full, but the salient features of each are embodied in the following excerpts:

Mr. Fulton's Letter.

Mr. M. A. Neff, pres., Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, Cincinnati, O.

Dear Sir: In your annual report at the recent convention in New York City, we note, among other things, the following:

"We are able to purchase parts, accessories and supplies at a discount of 40% off the regular list price."

Will you, as President of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, please address to the writer an open letter in which you state clearly and explicitly your attitude on the subject "The Place of the Jobber and Dealer in the Motion Picture Theater Supply Business"?

We are impelled to ask for this frank statement of your position, as the head of the large body of exhibitors whom you have the honor to represent, because it seems to us that your policies mean extermination to 500 of us who have for years been a part and parcel of the moving picture industry.

Thanking you in advance for the courtesy of an early reply, we are, Yours very truly,

E. E. FULTON.

President Neff's Reply.

Mr. E. E. Fulton, 154 W. Lake St., Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sir: In reply to your communication of August 16th, 1913, would say:

You have asked for a frank statement of my position. In brief this is my position—I stand for the bona fide motion picture exhibitor first, last, and all the time, and he comes first, and rightly so, as he is the first to secure the nickel to distribute to the great army of those in the other branches of our business. Heretofore he has received small recognition, but the time has now arrived when he must be considered in all matters pertaining to our business, and if by securing a few privileges we should have hurt anyone, it is only just and fair that we as exhibitors should at least be allowed to retain a small percentage of the amount that we take in; and if we can buy accessories at wholesale prices, I fail to understand why anyone should object. When an exhibitor cannot compete with his competitors, he has to either move, or give up business.

I am sure no one can blame an exhibitor for buying ⅝ x 10 inch carbons for $2.70 per 100, or $24.50 per thousand, or intermittent sprocket and solid star and shaft, old price $7.50, new price $2.50. Do you blame us for saving $5.00 on a sprocket? The old price of a web star wheel was $3.00. Can you object to us buying it for $.75? Measuring machines can be purchased for $12.00, the old price was $25.00. Other supplies in proportion to prices quoted. 40% off, and they are guaranteed, or to be returned. Will you furnish supplies to the exhibitors at the same prices?

And that you may fully understand the situation, there is not an exhibitor in the United States, to my knowledge, that is interested financially one penny in the American Motion Picture Supply League, or any other supply house, except the one in Pittsburgh, and a very small one at Cleveland, and possibly another place or two which I cannot recall. Very truly yours,

M. A. NEFF, Pres.

ATTENTION, CALIFORNIA EXHIBITORS.

Are you making your arrangements for the annual convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America State Branch No. 12 which will convene in San Diego, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, September 9th-10th-11th and 12th?

We expect to have a great gathering. Every exhibitor and his wife—from Siskiyou to San Diego—will be there. You must be there sure.

We have arranged for a special train from San Francisco, leaving Monday evening, September 8th, at 6 o'clock. Fare from San Francisco, round trip, $15.00, good for 15 days, with stop-over privileges on return trip. We will go down through the San Joaquin Valley. Fare and a third will be charged from all points on the Northwestern Pacific and Western Pacific to San Francisco or Stockton. All exhibitors living along line of the proposed routing can board special train at their home town or nearest point. Arrangements have been made to give us a splendid time. Sightseeing trips, including a genuine bull fight, in Tia Juana, Mexico. Grand ball and banquet—headquarters U. S. Grant Hotel. And aside from all that, this promises to be an eventful and important meeting.

Business of vital importance to every exhibitor in the state will be transacted, and to protect your interests and advance your ideas you must surely come. The league in California and throughout the United States has never been so strong numerically or as powerful as now. A booking agreement with all exchanges is what we want to get. If you are not affiliated, now is the time to join.

Exhibitors south of San Jose on Coast Line—one and one-third fare for round trip to Los Angeles. $3.00 round trip Los Angeles to San Diego. Be in Los Angeles Tuesday morning, and all go down to San Diego together. Exhibitors north of San Francisco and Stockton buy one and one-third, fare round trip ticket to San Francisco or Stockton and $12.00 round trip from these points to Los Angeles and $3.00 round trip Los Angeles to San Diego. Exhibitors south of Stockton on Valley Line can join special at their towns. Exhibitors on Santa Fe can get one and one-third fare round trip to San Diego. Those who want to be on the big special must send in their names and money to the secretary at once so that space can be arranged for. Come on, boys, bring your wife or sweetheart and join the crowd. Let us hear from you whether you are a member or not.

W. A. CORY, Secretary.

OFFICIAL CONVENTION CALL.

Illinois Convention.

The motion picture exhibitors of the state of Illinois will meet in convention at Peoria Tuesday and Wednesday, September 23rd and 24th. Every member of our league is urged to attend the convention, and every bona fide exhibitor in the state of Illinois, whether a member or not, is invited to attend. This will be the most important convention ever held in the state of Illinois, as a new set of officers will be elected to fill vacancies. Every visiting exhibitor will be entertained and on the evening of the 24th a big banquet will be served.

Indiana Convention.

The exhibitors of the state of Indiana will meet on Tuesday, September 30th, and Wednesday, October 1st, either in Indianapolis or Muncie. Big preparations are being made for this convention. Every member of the M. P. E. L. of A. is expected to attend. Splendid entertainments are being planned and a big banquet will be held at night. Every bona fide exhibitor in the state of Indiana is invited to attend. Officers will be elected to fill all vacancies.

M. A. NEFF,
President Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

FLORIDA CONVENTION NOTICE.

The first convention of the Florida State Branch No. 33, M. P. E. L. of A., will be held at Tampa, Fla., for three days, beginning Monday, August 31st, 1913.

President E. O. Griffith is working hard to make this first convention a big success and he is receiving daily letters from exhibitors all over the state assuring him of their attendance at this meeting. All moving picture exhibitors of the state of Florida, whether members of the league or not, are urged to make a special effort to be present at this convention, as many matters of vital importance to the exhibitor will come before the meeting.

The entertainment portion of the program is not overlooked, as special attention will be given to all visiting exhibitors to see that they enjoy their stay while in Tampa. National President M. A. Neff and National Secretary G. H. Wiley have been invited to attend.

MAYOR GAYNOR'S ADDRESS TO CONVENTION.

The National Secretary of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America has had printed in pamphlet form the address of the Hon. Wm. J. Gaynor, Mayor of New York, which was delivered on July 8 last at the national convention at the Grand Central Palace, New York City.

There was no accompanying information with the circular as to whether the national secretary is distributing them to exhibitors or whether exhibitors may write to him for quantities of them to pass out among their patrons. We trust Mr. Wiley will make this matter clear through a later notice.

From a typographical point of view the circular may be criticised on account of the smallness of the type. It is a four page 6 x 9 folder, the front being used as a title page. The two inside pages contain the text of the address and the fourth page is blank. It would have been much better if the fourth page had oeen utilized by having the type larger and allowing it to spread over three pages instead of two. As it is now it would be difficult to read in any subdued theater light, and it is doubtful whether anyone would care to wade through it in any light, owing to the eye strain it would entail. Besides this it is badly paragraphed. There should be more breaks to relieve the solid phalanx of plain body type. Outside of that it's a wonder.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

Ohio Courts Decide Against Law Licensing M. P. Operators.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court of Ohio declaring unconstitutional an act of the legislature requiring moving picture operators to be licensed by an official designated for that purpose contains many interesting points. In the course of the decision the court says:

> "The examiner is made the exclusive judge as to whether or not the applicant is trustworthy and competent. No standard is furnished by the General Assembly as to the qualification, and no specifications as to wherein the applicant shall be trustworthy and competent, but all is left to the opinion, finding and caprice of the examiner. He is the autocrat with unlimited discretion, without rules prescribing the qualifications of applicants for license only so that he finds them trustworthy and competent."

The court then calls attention to the fact that there are provided six districts in the state and six examiners, each of whom may have his own notions as to what shall constitute the applicant trustworthy and competent; and so there may be, in the first instance, as many different standards in the state as there are examiners, whereas, the standard should be uniform throughout the state.

The court points out, however, that it will sustain a proper law for licensing moving picture operators. Such a law the court says must establish standards of efficiency and certain definite tests. The present law leaves the licensing power in the hands of an official whose arbitrary decision is final. Such a provision the court declares would militate against the general welfare of the state.

MASSACHUSETTS BRANCH ACTIVE.

At a recent meeting of the Massachusetts State Branch of the Exhibitors' League, the resignation of Mr. Joseph Mack from the presidency was accepted, and Mr. Ernest Horstmann was elected to succeed to the office. At a meeting held shortly after this quite a few new members were taken in, and the league is again very much alive in Massachusetts. No better equipped man than Mr. Horstmann could have been secured as president. He is very much interested in the League, is earnest, and has the ability to put things across. What is more, Mr. Horstmann has a very convincing way of talking. And the membership list is bound to swell every time he makes one of his characteristic speeches. The Massachusetts State Branch has not really decided with which of the two factions to ally itself, and there has been some talk of remaining independent of either, and to merely be a state organization, without any outside connections. A special meeting was held this week, at which members of the "seceding" state organizations were present, to tell their side of the fracas. Mr. Neff was expected to be present, to explain his side of the affair, but was unable to come to Boston. On this account no action was taken, except to call a meeting for Friday, August 25, at which this State Branch will reorganize and decide on which side of the fence it will go, or whether to remain independent of both. At all events, the Massachusetts branch is again active and interested, which is most encouraging, after the state of coma into which it had fallen. HENRY.

SWINDLERS DOING "LOCAL STUFF."

Reports have reached this office of a set of moving picture fakers who have been successfully working in New England. Their scheme is that of going into a town and contracting with a theater manager or the Board of Trade for the making of a series of local motion pictures. They set up a dummy camera, without an inch of film in it, turn it loose on anything that anybody wants taken, and after collecting a deposit they disappear to parts unknown.

Merchants have paid for having their stores photographed and residents owning pretty homes have paid for having them filmed with their families, only to find out that it is a swindle. This sort of thing has a distinctly harmful effect upon the good name of the business, and exhibitors, hereafter, when they notice any local filming being taken by strangers, should speak to someone in authority and have the proceeding investigated.

This gang that has been working New England is said to have an advance man who arranges for as many dupes in a day as possible, and because the scheme is so novel they have been having an easy time in getting victims. It is the old photo-enlargement game of years ago in a new guise.

INDIANA "INTERNATIONAL" CONVENTION.

The Indiana State Branch of the International Motion Picture Association will hold its first semi-annual convention at Indianapolis on Wednesday, September 10. The state headquarters are located in rooms 410 and 421 Saks Building, Indianapolis.

Arrival in Los Angeles of Isadore Bernstein, the New Manager of the Universal West Coast Studios.

Exchange Assets

An Interesting Symposium of Ideas on Exchange Management.

(Concluded)

By H. Z. Levine.

THE junk exchange is a veritable incubus which drains the vitality or cash drawers of the regular exchanges. With the remarkable increase in the output of outlaw "single" and "feature" releases, they have been multiplying with the precipitation peculiar to mushrooms. In former years, when the "lid" was on the market, as it were, and an "outsider" had as much chance of "getting in" as has Lucifer of getting into Heaven, these junkers secured their film through a well organized "underground" railroad system. Buying old material in this way, they were able to get subjects at five-tenths and one cent per foot. And thus equipped with a cheap stock of reels, costing from five to ten dollars per reel, they were organized to handle several junk accounts on the basis of one-dollar-a-reel-per-day at fifteen or eighteen dollars. Some of the most remarkable collections of "cast-off" and out of date subjects were collected in these junk exchanges. Even today one can rent there a subject two or three years old, (and thus compare the pictures of "today" with those of "yesterday"). Often the uninitiated exhibitor will judge a manufacturer's present output by the stuff he gets from his junk exchange. As a protection against these leeches, legitimate exchangemen found it necessary to open junk offices themselves—and thus at least regulate rental rates. But this subterfuge didn't solve the junk problem. It only accentuated it. The only solution in the mind of Ed Lux, manager of the Cincinnati-Buckeye Film Exchange, is to relegate junk to the junk heap.

Ed. Lux, Manager Cincinnati-Buckeye Exchange.

"It seems to me," said the classic-featured Ed, "Ohio is the richest state in the Union in junk exchanges. We have them here, everywhere. They seem to grow up over night—and some go out of existence the night following their birth. But regardless of how long they exist they do more than their measure of harm by educating the exhibitor in the wrong direction and cutting rental prices. The junk retirement plan now under consideration by the exchange organizations and film manufacturing combinations is a feasible proposition likely to work out to the great advantage of all. The first thing to do is to cut down the junk dealers' supply—or close up their source of supply. They cannot afford to buy from legitimate manufacturers—and some big manufacturers will not deal with them under any circumstances.

"So if then they were not able to secure stuff from the legitimate manufacturers and the exchanges shut off the leaks in their own establishments, the junkers would soon go out of business or go into the junk feature business—which is equivalent to suicide—for a junk feature service is a false representation proposition and naturally a self-killer. A suggested plan, which has its merits, is the scheme whereby each exchange returns each week to its manufacturing affiliation as many old reels as it gets new ones. Hence, if an exchange is buying twenty-eight reels, it is obliged to return twenty-eight reels—thus, as far as the exchange is concerned, junk is retired automatically. The present feature situation, however, is complicating things considerably, but the assets of legitimate exchanges will not be affected by the feature business unless present rental arrangements are considerably changed and exchanges are forced to make reductions—for days the exhibitor runs features. The junkers are the fellows who affect our 'assets.'"

With a purchase of a 21 or a 28 reel program a week, an exchange receives about twelve hundred and fifty posters. The handling, recording and filing of these posters is an intricate problem. Posters take up more space in exchanges than perhaps all the rest of the stock put together. This is the bane of the exchangemen's existence—yet the paper is as important as the reel of film itself—indeed, sometimes more important than the reel. It is easy at times to get by with a mediocre reel if the paper is big and attractive—but often a good reel is lost or killed by poor paper. So important a factor does A. W. Blankmeyer, manager of the Detroit Universal, believe paper to be that he personally supervises the poster department, with Mr. Peckham, his able lieutenant in direct charge. Blankmeyer and Peckham can be found some evenings, along about 10 o'clock, in their shirt sleeves, mapping out schemes for poster filing and indexing.

A. W. Blankmeyer, Manager Detroit Universal Exchange.

"Were we to lose sight of our ever-increasing supply of paper, we would sure be crowded out of our offices," said Mr. Blankmeyer. "To solve the space problem, we have devised a tube system. This system is a space economizer and storage affair. These tubes (which have the appearance of mailing tubes), are the length of a one-sheet width and about four inches in circumference. We are able to roll up about two or three dozen posters and slip them into the tubes. The number of the reel is marked on the end of the tube and thus it is filed away. Usually, ten one-sheets are folded up for ordinary purposes and placed in the stock pigeonholes. When this supply runs out, we have recourse to our reserve supply in the tubes. We also keep special records of attractive and business-getting paper, and in this way can assist exhibitors with their theater-front displays."

"Competing regular exchanges can do each other considerable harm if they are non-believers in co-operation. Except in very few instances and in some peculiar sections of the country, all exchange managers co-operate with each other (along with the assistance of the business-like and reliable exhibitors), in eliminating the undesirables. There isn't a stronger adherent of the co-operating plan than A. A. Schmidt, manager of the Victor Film Service of Buffalo.

"Often I get applications for service from some unknown exhibitors, located in a small town or large city. When such application is received our staff has instructions to communicate with our competing exchanges and a statement of his reliability and his account is rendered. If he happens to owe our competitor some money, he is refused service until he pays up. Our competitors do the same. Operating this get-together plan, we are protected against 'smart-guys.' An exchange to run with profit has to watch carefully its scale of rental prices and draw a comparison with the prices of competitors. Ordinarily, there is a tacit understanding between the different exchanges as to prices. There's nothing in cut-throat and cut-price practices— usually, it is the undoing of the manager. On a 21 or 28 reel buy, an exchange must have a certain number of first run customers, a certain number of second runs and so on at certain prices, depending on its program and overhead expenses. In taking on business below a certain minimum there's a good opportunity of going broke."

In recapitulating the interviews with Messrs. Freuler, Morgan, Marentette, Snitzer, Bryson, Lux, Blankmeyer, Hopp, Schmidt and Plough, one point is absolutely clear—an exchange manager hasn't a sinecure. Little does the obstreperous and complaining exhibitor appreciate the amount of worry and detail a manager wrestles with daily. Yet, he receives the complaining exhibitor with a smile, a firm grip and a pleasant word—and regardless of the justice or injustice of the complaint, he preserves an exterior at once ameliorating, diplomatic and pacifying. Only in extreme cases is his spirit ruffled or provoked, but he believes like Marty Williams of Kansas City—"I should worry," says Marty, "when there are jobs where you work twenty hours a day and mine is only a nineteen hour job!"

"Doomed to Die or The Vial of Wrath"

Three-Reel Union Feature.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THIS is not a cheerful story, but its dramatic power cannot be denied. Looking at the picture one has a feeling as if some stray page from Maupassant or Zola had painted itself on little strips of celluloid, detailing and intensifying those horrors of which the pens of Zola and Maupassant were so fond. It has not only striking dramatic power but the added charm of novelty, which, considering the dreadful melodramatic drivel with which the screen is burdened nowadays, affords no mean measure of relief to the spectator. The standard of art and photography in most Union productions is above the average, and in this picture this standard is well maintained.

Cinema "Eclair"

Scene from "Doomed to Die" (Union Features).

The story is exceedingly simple as most really tragic stories are apt to be: A pretended friend seeks to seduce a wife from her loyalty. Her husband, an expert in bacteriology, discovers his friend's perfidy and turns his intimate knowledge of science into an instrument of almost fiendish vengeance. I cannot find any fault with the acting of the principals, which was really of a high order, but I do not think the director rose to the possibilities of the subject. There is an occasional lack of finish, and the explanation of motives is not always as clear as such an explanation should always be. I cannot help commending the clever way in which the dramatis personae are made to bow to the spectator at the beginning of the story; it is a charming innovation in Union Features.

NEW ENGLAND PICTURE PERSONALITIES.

MR. JACOB LOURIE.

The subject of this sketch is one of the best known and most popular of New England exhibitors. In May, 1909, Mr. Lourie decided to enter the moving picture business and at that time organized the Beacon Theater Company, of Boston, of which corporation he is president and general manager. Associated with Mr. Lourie in this concern are Mr. O. Grosberg, treasurer, and Mr. S. Solomont, assistant treasurer. Mr. Lourie, however, is the only one of the company to give his undivided attention to the business, and to him is due the credit for the success enjoyed by the houses operated by the Beacon Theater Company. The Beacon theater, Boston, is one of the finest houses in the country, built especially for the exploitation of moving pictures and vaudeville, and cost $75,000. In January, 1911, Mr. Lourie advised his company to buy the Colonial Theater, Nashua, N. H., which was promptly done. The next year, the Nashua Theater, of that city, which had been operated in opposition to the Colonial, was also acquired, on Mr. Lourie's instigation. In 1913, Mr. Lourie advocated the purchase of an estate of fifteen stores and the Shawmut Theater, Blue Hill Avenue, Roxbury, Mass., and the Beacon Theater Company promptly proceeded to acquire this property. The Shawmut was purchased subject to an existing lease, and Mr. Lourie will assume control at its expiration.

SOL LESSER IN NEW YORK.

Pacific Coast Feature Man to Open New York Office for the Golden Gate Film Exchange.

Sol Lesser, of San Francisco, has returned to New York City. Before he starts home he plans to open here an office, fully equipped even to projection room, for the Golden Gate Film Exchange of San Francisco. This company has made a change in its policy, which heretofore has been the marketing of a regular program of a manufacturers' group. It has taken over the Pacific Feature Film Company. Mr. Lesser has been connected with both concerns and will continue with the Golden Gate. It is intended to release weekly at least seven features, and sometimes eight or nine. Among these will be the Exclusive program and Union Features. The company will supply exhibitors in California, Nevada, Arizona, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana.

"Out on the coast we are building larger picture theaters than ever," said Mr. Lesser at the Exclusive offices the other day. "My company is a firm believer in the future of the feature. We think the single reel will be valuable chiefly to balance programs. Personally I believe a person can't, these days, go into a theater and get into the atmosphere of a story in one reel. We have tried out the question, and we find that we can do a far better business with the big stuff—the multiple feature. In our purchasing office here in New York, which we hope to locate this week, we intend to buy on merit. We are glad to see the open market so far as the exhibitor is concerned. We figure that the day of the arbitrary program, compelling the exhibitor to take a service the exchange desires regardless of the theater-man's wishes, is passing. So, seeing what we construe to be the trend of the times, we are going to keep pace with the market."

CINES BRINGS SPANISH ACTORS TO ROME.

George Kleine, who has exclusive American rights for all Cines productions, announces the receipt of important advices from the Cines Company concerning the importation of seventy-five actors and actresses from Spain. These people were especially engaged by the Cines Company for a series of spectacular Spanish plays. Several thousand Spanish costumes are now being made up in the big wardrobe department of the Cines Company and painters are busy with a number of magnificent settings. The productions are all under the direct management of Director Guazzone, the producer of "Quo Vadis."

Foreign Trade Notes

BRITISH NOTES.

(From Our Own Correspondent.)

The next American company to immigrate to these shores for the purpose of making spectacular pictures should have no difficulty in securing real soldiers to assist in battle scenes. Yesterday Col. Seely, the War Secretary, told Parliament that the troops at Aldershot were assisting in the production of moving picture films. Contrary to opposition being raised, he said he hoped the films which would be inspected by the Army Council before exhibition would create an interest in the army and be useful for recruiting purposes.

Mr. J. E. Williamson, a gentleman associated extensively with the scientific and experimental aspects of the industry, is now busily engaged on a new series of submarine pictures. An ingenious contrivance has been made that will enable him to descend to the ocean bed down a tubular shaft at the bottom of which is a compartment with windows for the pictures to be taken through. Several very powerful electric arcs will be employed to illuminate the area to be filmed. By this arrangement it is hoped to secure films of the denizens of the deep worthy to be ranked with the many excellent pictures of animals in natural environment.

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good" and the moving picture has provided the street bag-snatcher with another loop-hole of escape. At Hampstead, the other day, a thief snatched a woman's handbag and bolted, but a hue and cry was soon raised and in less time than it takes to tell about fifty people were in hot pursuit. A policeman stood out to stop him, but the breathless thief managed to gasp out, "Jerk me aside, we are doing this for the pictures." The constable released his hold and the miscreant escaped. There is the essence of a plot for a novel comedy in this.

Should the nation buy films? The question is again being raised here as to the advisability of purchasing copies of certain films to be preserved in one of the great museums. Such subjects as the "Battle of Waterloo," "Ivanhoe," "Charge of the Light Brigade," it is pointed out would be valuable in future years.

A statement has been issued from the London office of the Ontario State Bureau giving particulars of a course of instruction in agriculture by the kinematograph, which the Ontario Department of Agriculture will shortly offer to farmers in the province.

A practice increasing in favor with film manufacturers for advertising their products is at present being exploited by five different firms in England. Arrangements are made with newspaper proprietors for the publication in serial form of the story of a picture. The instalments are published each week simultaneous with the release of the film depicting the progress of the story up to that period. In this fashion Edisons are "booming" their "What Happened to Mary" series, and Gaumonts are similarly advertising in conjunction with the Weekly Dispatch a picture entitled "No Chance."

The picture obstructor is likely to receive harsh treatment from the English magistrate. Saying that it was a stupid, senseless thing to do a Highgate justice recently fined a youth two pounds for waving a walking stick in front of the screen at the Alexander Palace.

The announcement that the "Flying A" company shortly intend to issue a series of medieval pictures in addition to their Western subjects has aroused considerable interest among exhibitors of better class pictures in this country. Hitherto the middle ages historical subject has been almost monopolized by such firms as Gaumonts, Pathe, and other (with the exception perhaps of Selig) continental firms.

John Lawson's champion house-wrecking sketch. "Humanity," has been filmed by the Magnet Company. For exhibitors in Jewish localities I would advise no better attraction. In Leeds, satirically known as the New Jerusalem, the film is being booked up all round.

The Newcastle County Court Judge was called upon to settle a nice point the other day. The Gaumont Company sued another film-hiring firm for damage done to a film let out to them. The film was damaged to such an extent that it would not take the sprockets, but as the damage was done in an Edinburgh theater the defendants considered themselves immune from responsibility, holding that they should not be held up for the actions of a third party who was not their servant. Gaumon'ts, however, were awarded full compensation.

The famous artist himself takes the leading role in the fourteenth century miracle play which will be ready in a month or two. Miss Marie Corelli has specially written a plot for Sir Hubert to produce. Asked why he had turned his attention to films instead of painting he said, "I cannot always be painting portraits. Painting is most exhausting work, and after I have worked at a portrait all the morning I want to do something else and I find all this craft of cinematography fascinating. To tell you the truth I am having the time of my life."

The canny Scot has a reputation for resource particularly where the "bawbees" are concerned. At a picture show at a Lanarkshire village payment for admittance is taken in jam and jelly jars when currency is not forthcoming. It is no uncommon sight to see a line of juveniles each laden with jars waiting at the doors. It is reported that on one occasion a collier "banged a saxpence" in the pay box and was asked to take his change in jelly jars as they had not taken any money so far that night.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN

A FREQUENT complaint on the part of photoplay professionals is one directed against the trespassing upon their domain by inexperienced people. Very often they are heard resenting what appears to them to be a policy of studio managements to fill up casts with more regard to economical production than a display of artistic merit. The professionals rightfully claim that no reputable producing concern will see economy in such a policy; and add that professionals who need work and the money it brings should be given preference over stage-struck people who are willing to give their services for practically no pecuniary return; their sole aim being to become the worshipped of the people.

With the subject put squarely before them the complaining professionals, a majority at least, must admit that if they were more honest with their friends and acquaintances and more fair to themselves they could reduce the army of invaders considerably. While young and old people almost worship their respective screen favorites and apparently love them for the appearance they make and their acting, there is in almost every case where personal interviews are sought with the favorites a selfish motive. The interviews are sought to open a way to get themselves, their children or some friend into the business. Some professionals, especially those who have had stage experience outside of the photoplay settings, have quick perception that enables them to anticipate what the visiting friends have up their sleeves. They very gracefully and ingeniously parry the artful advances and ultimately escape introducing the visitors to the "manager who engages people to pose." "They don't work me for anything like that," professionals often say, "there are enough of us that need the jobs. I won't encourage usurpers."

* * *

Those who succeed in thus escaping the responsibility that would be placed upon them quite naturally win the gratitude and admiration of their fellow professionals. And after all they have only figured as a champion for a selfish purpose and neglected a sphere in which they could win the gratitude of the public. Opportunities are offered them to become missionaries for a most laudable purpose. Most players, in conversing with their friends from the auditoriums of theaters are disposed, sometimes involuntarily, to convey exaggerated notions of the salaries the photoplayers get and the delight afforded them by being recipients of the public's admiration. Some go so far as to weave glowing tales of sumptuous entertainment and other favors shown them by distinguished people. It is true that this is sometimes done "to string the poor boobs along," as some say. But it is wrong. It increases the hunger of the uninitiated and if continued it makes the appetite so irresistible that the poor victims will sacrifice anything to share in the gilded life that is portrayed to them.

* * *

The duty of the professionals is to discourage the overtures from the starting point in a straightforward and pleasant, though firm, manner. An example that should be followed was given in a studio recently. A young man holding a good position in a bank had tried for years to get into the studio, or some department connected with it. . He persisted in his overtures despite the repeated replies that there were no vacancies. He secured repeated interviews with various officials in the company through the efforts of influential friends and friends of influential people that he could enlist in his cause. Finally he was looked upon as a pest, and to squelch him with a test he was turned over to an old professional. No test was given. As a substitute the player gave the young man a course in reasoning that practically killed his ambition for honors in the photoplay field. After learning all he could of the young man's family and business connections the old player compared the details with those of an actor's life. He pictured the hardships and vicissitudes attending the theatrical field and pointed out the foolishness of trading certainty for uncertainty. "Yes," interrupted the youth, "but look at the success so many men who started in commercial fields have attained on the stage. I feel I was born to become the same as they did." The player stuck to his job like a minister of the gospel trying to convert a terrible example and finally won out, and a professional who had been an interested listener promptly declared that if the same policy was pursued in most of the cases that arise all concerned would be vastly benefited. Before leaving the young man said: "I am satisfied now. Had I been spoken to in the manner that you have spoken to me, I would have given up long ago. I hung on because of the stories given me of the bright side of the life and felt that some day I would get a chance to fill a vacancy in some small way and gradually climb up. I realize now that the climbing is hard and the struggle to remain at the apex is much harder."

* * *

Nearly all the leading producing companies in the photoplay field have had a rule for some time that none but professional people be employed. When firmly applied this rule has been the means of saving the producers much annoyance and has so discouraged applicants that they have sought other fields of employment. But one loop-hole has gradually developed into the dimensions of a flood-gate. The employment of "supers" dignified under the titles of "extras" has been productive of innumerable barnacles that attach themselves to everything and everybody connected with motion picture studios. The situation is such that a vigorous campaign of persuasion should be inaugurated to save the foolish being from a life of indolence, and perhaps worse. In and about many studios crowds of people, young and old, gather daily for a chance to get in a picture, notwithstanding many of them often hover about for days, and sometimes weeks, without getting the chance. Mobs for theatrical work can be secured with ease, as they always have been since theatricals became known, but never have the volunteers been so plentiful as they are now. Men capable of and with opportunity to earn more money at some other following and women who could be more useful in their homes flock to the scene of operations and give no thought to the time when they ridiculed the "supers" in the theaters. They are "extras," and the children that are offered for sacrifice upon the altar of fame and fortune are numerous enough to challenge the taking of a census. There never was a time when so many beautiful and precocious children existed as at present, and the introduction of the prodigy is invariably the same: "It is not the money I look at—I never would have brought her here; but all my friends have been urging me to get her in the pictures. She is so pretty, as you can see, and you ought to see her antics about the house. She is far beyond her age intellectually." It goes without saying that in most of the cases the old adage that "Love is blind" is strikingly illustrated.

Here is the way one photoplayer carries the fame he has achieved, which is considerable. An old actor he had not seen for twenty years called upon him. The famous one was profusely congratulated upon his success before the camera, after which the visitor asked for "a boost to get a job." A bystander remarked that the departing visitor took a great interest in, and evidently thought much of, the famous player, to which the latter replied: "O, that's all bunk. Come to think of it, I am not quite sure he knew me twenty years ago; and if he did I am—sure that I was to him, like the rest of them—a small Potato in the patch; and when I wanted the loan of a twenty I got it—not. I like to meet old friends, but that lather stuff is nauseating."

KALEM'S BIG BASEBALL PICTURE A HIT.

Kalem's big two-reel baseball feature entitled "Breaking Into the Big League" was billed on its release day, August 20th, at several of the large Broadway theaters, where it did a turn-away business. At the Broadway Theater the attendance was terrific, being attracted by the announcement and special billing matter which proclaimed the fact that John J. McGraw and Christie Mathewson were to appear in the picture. McGraw and Mathewson are prominent throughout the story, but what made the Broadway exhibition more noteworthy on this occasion was the fact that John J. McGraw and Christie Mathewson were in the audience. They occupied a lower box and attracted no particular attention until the spot-light man in the gallery got busy and showed them up to a large and enthusiastic audience.

Forty seats had been reserved for members of the New York baseball team and their wives or sweethearts. The picture pleased immensely and was punctuated at frequent intervals by much applause. It shows the New York Giants at their training quarters at Marlin, Texas, and there are many views of regular championship games at the Polo Grounds. As a popular picture, there was every evidence, judging from the enormous attendance that night, that the picture will be a big box office winner.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Into the New.

OUTGROWING the old house, the Idle Hour Theater, Watertown, S. D., sister theater to the house of the same title in Aberdeen, issues a souvenir program of the opening of a new house with the same name. It is a six-page booklet, 4x7½, bound in a cream yellow with blue and yellow border and blue text throughout. It is better than we'l gotten up; it is tasty and elegant in appearance and typical of a house that has outgrown its modest past. It is typical, too, of the advancement of the business in general and the demand for larger and handsomer houses. Mr. C. T. Smithers is to be congratulated on this step in advance. Ten years ago the opening of any new house would have been marked by an almost sickening splurge, if it were marked at all. Now quiet refinement replaces bombast.

New Post Cards.

The Kraus Manufacturing Co. has just placed on the market a set of thirty postcards of licensed players in the photo-geletaine process that is the best thing they have yet put out. They are higher in price than their more familiar glazed sepia finish, but they are very much more than worth the slight difference in price, since the effect is practically that of an actual photograph and yet they are put out at a price that will permit them to be used as souvenirs at even a five cent admission. They are really artistic and many of them are made from exclusive photographs. They have an unusually good one of Henry Walthall, a new pose of Miss Sweet and all are above the average. They can be used advantageously as single cards or in sets of three or five.

Another issue is a set of four exclusive poses of G. M. Anderson in his familiar Broncho Billy make-up. These were specially posed for the Kraus Company and are unusually good both as to likeness and action. A set of four Broncho Billy nights with a fresh card for each night would bring in money.

Taken in conjunction with their photo-geletaine large cards for lobby work they have one of the best series the licensed exhibitor can possibly use.

Snap.

The Colonial Theater, Eldorado, sends in a four-page card folder, and Manager S. M. Farrar writes that it served to turn business away for three nights. It looks like some of Bert Williams' work, particularly the catchline: "As cool as a cave and it costs but a dime." There is punch to the paragraphs; the sort of punch that brings business. It leaves you with the feeling that you would like to go and see the pictures described, and so you do. Read this for example:

> A thrilling, rip-roaring and sensational feature full of patriotic impulses with a slam and crash to every-foot. The battle between the American soldiers and the Filipino insurrectos will make you stand up on your tiptoes and will send ice-cold shivers of suspense tingling up and down your spinal cord and you will want to reach down and pick up a brick and get into the game yourself.

Now, by way of contrast, read this from another contribution:

> The self-centered man, ever confident of his success, wins in love over the more sensitive friend. Assurance and success come naturally. Overwhelmed by the game of chance, it is significant that he takes his defeat with less philosophy than most men. To him it is utter failure—the end of all.
> His incompatible nature causes him to carry his rash act to the climax, nor can others prevent.

Which of the two would coax the money from your pocket if you were the man outside trying to decide what you wanted to do? The real purpose of advertising is to bring into your house the people who would not, in the usual run of things, be one of your patrons. You can't merely tell them you have a show. You must convince them that you have a good show.

Prints His Own.

Anees K. Maluf, of the Lion Opera House, Glasgow, Kentucky, sends in a weekly program of his own pringting with a promise that he will better this publication as he gets along in the game. It is eight pages and cover, three by five inches, and it looks better than his letter promised. The cut work is a little blurred, due to lack of make-ready, but the general effect is good, and there is a surprising amount of reading matter in the small space. It covers the production of the week, the week starting with a Tuesday. Three reels, with a couple of specials, makes a good showing of material, and with the Saturday special Mr. Maluf throws in a brick of ice cream or any five cent fountain drink. This extract from the back page has a convincing sound and may suit others:

> We will consider it a favor if you will tell us what kind of pictures you want to see, that's what we are here for, to please you. We select weekly all pictures shown in this theater and will be glad to get the picture you want—if it is good.
> WE KNOW THE STORY OF EVERY FILM MADE AND WHAT THE CRITICS SAY ABOUT IT, SO WE OUGHT TO KNOW.

This is very different from the operator in a small Massachusetts town who is permitted to select the house program by a very short-sighted manager. One patron asked for certain films and was told he would not get them as the producer was poor. One well-known leading man is never shown because—in the estimation of the all-sufficient operator—he is a "has been," while another brand is not used "because the pictures are badly lighted." If we had an operator like that we would kick him so far down the street he wouldn't get back in time for Christmas. Houses should be run to please the patrons, not the operator.

A Double Program.

A program of the Columbia and Elite Theaters, Bowling Green, Kentucky, offers but a single feature for each house each day, whether this be a one-part story or two or three. The larger half of the space is given to the advertisers and this, we think, is a mistake. The first function of a house program is to do the house good, and enough space should have been taken for the program to give the entire program. It stands to reason that the other titles on the day's run possess some pulling power and the names of all should have been given. This could be done with the space now used through condensation and the use of a smaller type. The cover is pretentious in appearance, being printed in black with a tint block, and it looks like the real thing, but it lacks a certain smartness of statement inside that discredits the cover. A lot more could be said in fewer words.

Getting a Good Crowd.

The other night we went over to Feltman's Park in the Flatbush section of Brooklyn. The park differs little from others in various sections of Brooklyn, but there is a marked difference in the audience from some of the open air crowds and business was capacity; capacity including a lot of emergency soap boxes and beer cases that supplement the regular seats. There are three Feltmans and John McAleer, who acts as manager, and all four are a "greeters" committee. They do not merely take tickets and count up. They stand by the entrance and every man and woman is made to feel that he or she is of more importance than their ten cent pieces that they put into the box office. It is team work carried out to a nicety and the result is a quiet and orderly family party. If a person gets noisy he is invited to leave and his money is returned. Nine times out of ten he comes back in a few evenings and fits into the general scheme of the audience. It certainly does not hurt their business to stop nuisances, and yet some managers argue that this cannot be done.

One thing that counted was a comment that William Feltman made one morning when there were about $30 worth of rain checks in the box the night before. "A lot of them joke us about the checks," he explained, "but we don't get sore to see the rain checks come in. We remember that we got the money for them and we are willing to give a show in return."

When an airdome manager can take up a rain check and smile at the same time, he is getting to be a "regular" manager.

The cut shows the enclosure dressed up for the Fourth of July, when Shenandoah was the special attraction. They do little paper work, but their advertising manner has made them a permanent clientele. It pays to be more than merely nice.

One Man and Another.

Here's a letter from a man we like. He is H. H. Johnson, of the Lyric Theater, Champaign, Ill., and he has been doing precisely what we urged live wires to do long ago. Instead of laying back in the collar because others did, he jumped in and pulled the load, not alone for himself, but for the man without enterprise. Both houses use licensed service and what is said helps the opposition equally with Mr. Johnson, but he went right ahead, getting out an interesting department, one that created and held interest. He might, occasionally, have credited an item to this paper, particularly in the cases where he used the signatures of editorial writers, but this is a detail of professional courtesy that lies with the practical newspaper man rather than the manager, and this paper tries to give stuff that helps, not for the sake of credit given, but to help the business. Mr. Johnson writes:

> Last summer I submitted a full page ad that I used in this city, but did not see any mention of same.
> Under separate cover I am mailing you a quantity of ads that I have run in the local paper. This paper has been very friendly to me and have asked me to furnish them with news items of the moving picture business. This was carried out in their paper about January 18th, and each Saturday they devoted a double page of the paper to the theatrical interests, the photoplay houses carrying ads on one page, and the vaudeville and dramatic house on the other page.
>
> On the photoplay page four columns were taken up with paid advertising by my house and one other one, each house had the privilege of filling the other three columns of the page with anything pertaining to the programs of the house or interesting news items in connection with the business.
>
> The other house that was advertising did not seem to be able to get dope for the space; in fact, it seemed to be an effort to cover the space taken for advertising, and the paper called on me for material for the page.
> In the samples of this page which you will receive under separate cover, you will find some full pages; you will find the dope that was furnished by me marked with blue pencil, and you will notice that it occupies the greater part of the page; at the same time you will also notice my ads were larger. I did not do this to hog the paper, but it was because the other house would not pay for an equal amount of the space, and the reason of me furnishing most of the news items was because the other house would not turn it in, in shape for publication.
>
> You will notice that I have part of the space taken up with a writeup on the coming week's show. I get this writeup mostly from the comments on the films in the "World," rewriting it so it will be for the public instead of the exhibitor. I usually write up at least two of the films for each day, sometimes three; the rest of the space, you will notice, I have given over to news items of the players or of the producers, and educational value of the motion picture.
> I have tried to handle this page so it will be for the uplift of the business in general here in this town and, while I have often devoted considerable space to my own house, I have always furnished something that the public and patrons of my competition would be benefited by if they read it, or would have a better understanding of the business as a whole.
>
> My news items and my stories on the educational value of the pictures have been reproduced from clippings secured in the "World," that it, most of them.
>
> This page is still running each week, but the size of the ads have been cut down to four columns seven inches, but I get the same space to furnish dope for.
>
> I would like to see mention of the ads I have sent you, either criticised or commented on in the advertising department of the "World," and I would also like to have you look over the news items on the value of the picture.
>
> I have been very proud of the opportunity I have been given by the paper to furnish the material, and I would like to know if what I have furnished has been of any value, or if I have made the best of the opportunity. I have tried to be clean in what I have said about my own house and, while I could have used the columns (that were at my disposal) to knock my competitors, I don't think you will find in any of the columns any item that was anything more than facts, and which the people here believe.
> I have spent over $900.00 the past year to advertise my house and I think I have every reason to believe that it has paid me well, and my idea of advertising is telling the truth in every line you have printed, and any house that keeps faith with their public and knows how to get a good picture will do business.
>
> I appreciate your work in the "World" very much; it is always an interesting department for me and one that I always read.

Not a Hog.

As Mr. Johnson says, he was not a hog. He got more space for the announcement of his coming program because he went at his work in a systematic manner and turned out nearly a column a week of really readable stuff about the coming films. He did not brag or blow his horn too loudly, but he turned out a column that any fan and most others would read with interest. He was able to do this because he has the writing gift, but with the same opportunity offered, the opposition manager neither wrote good stuff himself or hired another to write it for him. He had from a quarter to half a column a week, but it was a jumble of stuff that did not greatly interest because it was not smartly written.

The miscellaneous matter was even better done. Some of it was straight clipping matter, while other items were revised, but it was all prepared with newspaper sense and presented in a form that could not but be helpful to the cause of the picture. We shuddered when we saw the size of the roll Mr. Johnson sent in, but it was worth going over and we enjoyed it both as a newspaper and an advertising man.

The Advertising.

It is only in the advertising that the other house is shot at and here only indirectly and in legitimate fashion. With so much space at command there was plenty of room for display and this display has been well looked after.

Mr. Johnson has a number of good catchlines, some of which we quote below.

> You can get the habit for a dime.
> We'll leave it to you whether or not you get the best value for your picture money at the Lyric.
>
> If it's good it's at the Lyric. If it's at the Lyric it's good.
> Pathe Weekly every Monday. Multiple reel features every Friday. Quality EVERY day.

We hope that now he has broken the ice Mr. Johnson will drop in frequently. He writes that he sent us a page last summer. Through some mishap his communication failed to reach us, but this is not likely to happen again.

But will Mr. Johnson and others please send in matter flat instead of rolled. Long experience has made us one of the best little jugglers ever, but we still have a fondness for the flat stuff that will open and stay open.

Babies in Glass.

Here is something that seems to be brand new. We think it will stand some beating:

> It remained for Harold Ballou, owner of the Olympian Theater, to find a new convenience for his patrons, and now it has been done other managers are wondering why it was not thought of before.
>
> Mr. Ballou's theater caters to a family trade, being out in the residence district of Renton Hill, and many mothers have been in the habit of taking their young children and babies with them when they attended this playhouse. Mr. Ballou noticed that often when the babies became restless the mothers would have to take them out until they became quiet, and thus miss part of the performance.
> This new wrinkle in motion picture house conveniences is a retiring room for women, which is glass inclosed, and where the babies can squall to their heart's content without disturbing anyone, while their happy mothers can see all of the fine points of the film through the windows of the room. This new idea was installed during Potlatch week, when the cozy little Olympian, at Madison and 14th, was treated to a thorough overhauling. Among the new improvements are an indirect lighting system, redecoration of the walls, a new screen built further back to improve the projection of pictures, a new velvet stage curtain, and the entire renovation of the pipe organ, which is said to be the third largest in a motion picture house in the state and the only one in an uptown theater.

We have heard the mothers of wailing children advised to "can" the noise, but Mr. Ballou puts them up in glass instead of cans, it would appear.

Mr. Ballou's house is in Seattle, and one of the house schemes is a four-page weekly. We think that Mr. Ballou should get more advertising for his well edited little sheet.

A Canadian Contribution.

K. M. Leach, of the Eagle Theater, Swift Current, Sask., sends a four-page weekly program with the comment that his aim is to give his Saturday patrons a list of the attractions for the coming week. Mondays the program is put into all the residences. There is a daily change of program with a feature every day, yet the entire program is put into two pages, six by nine inches, without undue crowding, and yet sufficient detail. A fabric-finish paper is used and the press work is reasonably good. All of the titles are in the same face of type, giving uniformity of appearance, and the daily program impresses itself on the eye at the first glance, as is not always the case where different sizes and faces of type are used. The use of italic dates, set at the left without indention, helps this result. On the whole, we think that Mr. Leach needs only to use a smooth surfaced paper to get a program that is good in every respect. The fabric finish does not lend itself well to rapid press work.

Knows Wesley by Mail.

Here is a letter from R. W. Buzzell, of the Plaza Theater, Northampton, Mass.:

> Excuse me for taking up your time, but you can look over the inclosures, and criticism of one line in your department of my feeble efforts would be greatly appreciated.
> Needless to tell you that I appropriate everything that looks good to me in every issue of the World and I would be at a loss without that paper every week.
>
> I would like to meet personally sometime Wesley, of Gardner and Rathbone, of Exeter; the latter is in charge of a house belonging to the same parties owning this; namely, Goldstein Bros. Amusement Co., of Springfield, Mass.
>
> He and I exchange reports on pictures, so we are somewhat acquainted.
>
> The day I came to this theater I saw a screen that was one-half a perfect picture and the other half you could not see, as bright houselights shone directly on it.
>
> I have a good union operator and a Mirroroid screen, and now my house is perfectly lighted with shaded lights, and I will back my picture against any one.
>
> You will see that I believe in cuts, and I also have a pianist who is glad to get Kalem and Vitagraph music for pictures.
>
> I had about three-quarters of the Grand Army post here and they enjoyed themselves thoroughly.
>
> Am running "What Happened to Mary" series and they are certainly interesting.
>
> Hope I am not taking too much of your time reading this. I just stopped to talk about taking pictures of the town tomorrow and I think that I will get them going if I can show the people movies of themselves.

The PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by Epes Winthrop Sargent

That Leather Binding.

THOSE who had ordered the new edition of Technique in the leather binding have had to wait a few days, for these did not come in with the cloth covers, but they were sent out last week and we think that the recipients did not mind the delay. The cloth bound edition makes an attractive little volume, but the copies in dark blue leather with gilt edges are a delight. The reading matter and the paper are the same, but for those who want to make the book a desk companion, the leather edition is worth the difference in price.

Shaw Sees the Punch.

Judge Shaw, who has not been represented in this department in some months, has been studying the punch and his simile is so good that it is passed along for the benefit of others. He writes:

> Read your chapter on the "punch" last night. This seems to be the idea of it as I get it: The story is like the human face. The features (incidents) may be ugly or beautiful, weak or strong, ill-matched or harmonious; but no matter how beautiful the face may be, if the animating soul (punch) is lacking, it is only a poor, pathetic dead face. On the other hand, the features may be plain, unattractive, but illumined by a great soul they become lovable, fascinating.

That's precisely it. You probably know some girl, beautiful in a perfect, doll-like way, who is uninteresting because she possesses no animating soul, while, on the other hand, some other woman with coarse complexion and poor features may be a most lovable woman and look attractive because soul shines through her eyes.

In the same way you may see what appears to be the perfect production of a perfect script and yet feel that something intangible is lacking because the punch has been omitted.

Give your story a soul.

If You Live In Buffalo.

If you live in Buffalo you can join the photoplay circle there by sending your name and address on a stamped envelope to this department. Don't send a postcard and just initials as a writer did the other day. You will not be bothered with circulars or letters. It is simply that we will not give addresses in this department because such publication is immediately followed by letters from a flood of advice grafters who are always looking for people on whom they may prey, and the address is not sent except to another address in the town mentioned.

Coincidences.

John William Kellette, who is all right even if he does live in New Rochelle, drops us a line on the yellowest kind of yellow paper. We hope some time that Kellette will write William Lord Wright, who opines that our own green paper makes more noise than a circus calliope. The Kellette paper is still louder, but he writes sensible things. A recent duplication moves him to this:

> Until today I was serene in the belief that I had something original, only to find out that you beat me to it. Strange, at that, for yours was "Building a Trust," and "The Trust that Was Busted" was mine, and while they differed in several instances, the underlying germ was the same.
> I simply indite this to show that had I seen the Lubin and I was prone to believe things, and having sent Lubin mine (which I didn't) I might think they "pinched it." Whenever I see anything similar to something I wrote produced by a company rejecting the script, I simply feel that somebody beat me to it. I think that is the better way, don't you? Too many embryo photoplaywrights get the idea that what they write is as fresh as a new laid egg, when, as a matter of fact, hundreds of aspiring future greats may have, at that time, Uncle Sam's mail packs burdened with just such scripts.
> And as to titles: I have found titles that I believed original with me later produced, only to find that the stuff was made up weeks before my script reached the studio. "The Little Girl Next Door," for instance, produced by Thanhouser, was identical in name, but not in theme, to one I submitted, but their story was filmed and finished more than a week before I put mine into the mails. When the aspiring photoplaywright gets feeling that he is being robbed, he ought to hie himself into the woods and give himself a good licking. The things he believes original with him, he is simply sending out weeks and months after somebody else had beaten him to it.

"Building a Trust" was written in October, made in December, but not released until July. Meantime Mr. Kellette had written a story that dealt with a Chinaman and an Irish woman and that had our title in reverse. He didn't accuse us of theft of suggestion because he knew we never had seen the script and we do not believe that he would have made the suggestion, anyhow. But he wrote a trust story with an Irishwoman and a Chinaman and we wrote one with an Irishwoman, a Chinaman and a negress. This is threshing out old wheat, but there are too many persons who still cling to the belief that if they see a story that is something like theirs it must be theirs. If they sent their story to the company releasing the other, they know the company steals. If they never sent it there, they are certain that some editor who did it stole the idea and sold it elsewhere. Just get it into your head that it is possible for two persons to think up substantially the same idea, and you'll get over that belief in the wholesale dishonesty in the studios.

Chatting with Miss Baker.

Some months ago, following the second Photoplaywriters' dinner, we announced that Miss Hetty Gray Baker had started for the coast to see what she might see. Here is her letter on her return:

> From the point of view of a photoplaywright, I got much encouragement to keep on, but the future for the tribe, and it's right at hand, is in multiple reel stuff. The people who want to make it a profession cannot afford to do only single reels. The increasing use of copyright books and plays for two and three-reel productions is more than a straw to show which way the wind blows; it is the wind itself, which is going, I'm afraid, to make it harder traveling for the original writer.
> Are you going to take up captions in your new book? I've been thinking a good deal about that subject lately. I accepted unquestioningly at one time the dictum "The perfect play has no caption." But I decidedly do not think so now. It seems to me that the caption, rightly worded and placed, has a very important part in increasing the interest or heightening the suspense in drama, and adding to the humor of comedy. The great trouble with captions is that they are generally used to explain the story, thus relegating the scenes to mere illustrations.
> The caption should, if it is humanly possible, merely introduce the succeeding scene, and be so worded that the spectator's anxiety to see what is coming next is whetted. The briefer and more pointed the caption the better. The few plays I have seen which were without captions would, I think, have been the happier for "a few kinds words." But these are, of course, to be preferred to the play which has a lot of narratives interpolated under the name of captions. I remember in one of my first plays, I wrote the synopsis by copying the captions, one after the other! It made a complete story!
> A good deal of light on how to write captions can be gained by studying Vitagraph captions. On the average I think they are unusually clear, pointed and well phrased. Biograph leans a bit to the narrative style, but it seems to me that the captions in that company's "The Wanderer" could, without exaggeration, be called perfect. They not only supplemented the story, which is the chief end of captions anyway, but appreciably heightened the poetry and appeal of that remarkable picture.
> Am I all wrong in this? "What about captions, anyhow?"

It will interest Miss Baker and many others to know that at this time we are arranging to run a series of articles on the multiple reel scripts by some of the best known photoplay editors. Lawrence S. McCloskey and Phil Lang are among those who will have discussions in an early issue. We hope to get the first one next week.

As to captions, the second edition of "Technique of the Photoplay" contains a very full chapter on leaders and inserts. It is shown that the leaderless script is not the script that is without leaders, but the one that does not need them, and emphasis is placed upon the fact that the leaderless script is seldom possible and that it is better to use too many leaders than too few.

Just the other day two scripts came to our desk. One had nearly a full reel of leader in what purported to be a three-reel play, BUT the leaders carried the story and it was merely a matter of translating the leader into action or else condensing it. The other script had one leader. By actual count it needed seventeen for twenty-nine scenes. The script was a botch. Not even the synopsis could straighten it out.

If you need leader, use it. Do not use more than you have to, but unless you are positive that you get the idea over in the action, write the leader even if you think it will be cut out.

Miss Baker quotes two excellent examples, Biograph and Vitagraph. Study these, but do your own thinking and formulate your own style.

Listen to Lamothe.

Here is shrewd talk from Julian Louis Lamothe, head of the New Orleans corner:

> In looking over my photoplay records the other day, I found that I had withdrawn from circulation the ideas of four plays after the second or third time out, and these ideas were afterward produced by other companies. One instance occurred in this city. A member of our Inquest Club sold his first script to American, and they praised the idea as being above the average. I had written up the same thing two years ago, and in better scenario form, but after its rejection by three companies, I considered that it would be a waste of postage to send it out again. But recently the thought came, that if I had continued sending out my scripts, any one of them might have reached the editor before the other fellow's did, and I might have made a sale or two more. So now I keep all my scripts going, sometimes improving, but at all times sending them out. My postage bill has increased considerably, but I shall feel compensated if a few of the resurrected scripts sell.
>
> The New Orleans Circle sends greetings. The membership increases at every meeting, and we are getting along famously. Marc Edmund Jones will spend the winter here, and we all look forward to his coming.

More Kalem Script.

We present this week, with apologies to Mr. Lang and our readers, the middle portion of the script of The Skeleton in the Closet, which got mislaid on the holdover bank, as type has an uncanny faculty of doing

With this inserted between the other portions, the complete script is at hand.

Scene 24. Exterior scene near Sheriff's home.
The sheriff and Kitty together. He can control himself no longer and ardently proposes to Kitty. She is undecided, but finally consents. They embrace. He leads her out of scene.
Scene 25. Before Sheriff's house.
Dan comes into scene. Stops as he sees someone approaching and smiles. Sheriff and Kitty enter. Sheriff tells Dan that Kitty has consented to marry him. Dan is surprised and hurt. He controls himself and manages to hide his feelings. He offers congratulations. Sheriff insists upon an immediate ceremony. He and Kitty exit. Dan looks after them and enters house.
Scene 26. Sheriff's living room as in former scenes.
Dan comes in, crestfallen. He looks about room. Picks up Kitty's shawl tenderly and starts to kiss it, but remembers he has no right to do so. He sits down and holds head in his hand.
Scene 27. Exterior of minister's house.
The minister greets the sheriff and Kitty as they come up. All enter house.
Scene 28. Same as 26. Sheriff's room.
Dan, seated with chin in hand, starts and looks about the room. "I have no right to stay here, now," he exclaims. He makes a decision and draws out an old grip into which he tosses his few belongings. He takes saddle from floor, tosses it over his shoulder and starts out of room.
Scene 29. Exterior of minister's as in Scene 27.
The minister comes out with sheriff and Kitty, having completed ceremony, and offers congratulations. Fade out.

END OF PART ONE.

Note.—Here a fresh page is taken for the start of scene two.

"THE SKELETON IN THE CLOSET."

Part Two.

Sub-title: LATER. THE TROUBLE MAKER.

Scene 1. Exterior of a country grocery store in the West.
A rough Westerner loafs outside store. Kitty and the sheriff enter. She carries a basket on her arm. It is some time after their marriage and they are doing some marketing. They enter store.
Scene 2. Roadway near grocery store.
Mason, now a regular bad man, saunters into scene. Looks off toward grocery store and starts in that direction.
Scene 3. Exterior of grocery as in former scene.
Mason saunters in and asks a few questions of the loafer. While they are conversing the sheriff and Kitty appear from store. Sheriff carries the market basket. He and Kitty walk out of scene without noticing Mason's presence, but Mason recognizes Kitty. He turns to the loafer and says "Who is that?" Man answers, "Why, that's the sheriff and his wife." Mason expresses, "Well, what do you think of that." Stands looking after couple.
Scene 4. Roadway.
Sheriff, with basket, and Kitty pass across scene.
Scene 5. Exterior of grocery.
Continuation of Scene 3. Mason makes a determined gesture, tugs at his belt and saunters off to follow Kitty and sheriff.
Scene 6. Exterior of sheriff's house as in former scenes.
Sheriff's horse is hitched. He appears with Kitty, still carrying basket. Mason is seen in background. Sheriff hands basket to Kitty, telling her he has business to attend to. He kisses her, mounts horse and rides off. Kitty enters house. Mason comes up and looks in window.
Scene 7. Interior of sheriff's as in former scenes.
Kitty is at table, taking things from basket.
Scene 8. Exterior of sheriff's.
Mason turns from window with leering expression. Shrugs his shoulders and knocks at door.
Scene 9. Interior of sheriff's house.
Continuation of Scene 7. Kitty looks up and says, "Come in." Mason saunters into room. Kitty is horrified. "What are you doing here?" "Oh, just a friendly call. Aren't you glad to see me?" Mason registers. She tells him to go. He calmly seats himself and begins to roll a cigarette. Begins to size up the place. Kitty renews her entreaties for him to leave. Mason blows a puff of smoke and leaning over table on his elbow, remarks:
Sub-title: "SUPPOSE I TELL YOUR HUSBAND THAT YOU'RE A CATTLE THIEF'S DAUGHTER!"
Kitty is amazed at the brazenness of this villain. She gets out her purse and gives him some coins. He insists upon having the entire contents of the purse, sticks money in his pocket and saunters out. Kitty looks after him in terror.
Scene 10. Exterior of sheriff's house.
Mason comes out with a cynical smile and strolls away.
Sub-title: A FEW DAYS LATER.
Scene 11. Exterior of Western Post Office.
Mason is talking to several men as Dan strolls up and takes part in the conversation. Kitty comes out of post office with one or two letters and a paper in her hand. Mason points to her and makes a slighting remark. Dan promptly knocks him down. Mason scrambles to his feet and draws a gun, but Dan has him covered. Mason pockets his gun, muttering to himself, and strolls away. Dan looks after him a moment, then proceeds to follow Kitty.
Scene 12. Exterior of sheriff's house.
Kitty appears with mail and enters.
Scene 13. Road near sheriff's.
Dan appears, looking quite concerned, and starts for sheriff's house.
Scene 14. Exterior of sheriff's house.
Dan appears and knocks.
Scene 15. Interior of sheriff's house as in former scenes.
Kitty admits Dan. He questions her regarding Mason. She breaks down and tells him her sad story. She sinks at table and weeps. Dan bends over to comfort her.

Inquiries.

NOTE—No questions can be replied to by mail. Look for your answers here. A list of addresses to which photoplays may be sent will be mailed on receipt of a STAMPED AND ADDRESSED ENVELOPE.

E. H.—Probably by now you have seen the announcements of Mr. Graybill's death.

CLOVER—Wallace Reid was Jim in "When Luck Changes," and J. W. Johnson played Steve in "The Greater Call."

M. C. A.—The information will be supplied if you will send a stamped and addressed envelope for reply.

M. C. M.—We have not heard of the player you mention lately, but believe that he is still in Los Angeles. We'll try and find out.

E. F. G.—Mention some other parts played, please. No cast sheet is given for "The Picket Guard." We may be able to pick up others.

A. F.—Freaky pseudoyms are barred from this column. Your suspicions are correct. The players named had those parts.

J. F. G.—Miss Eleanor Caines and Frank De Vernon had the parts mentioned in "One on Romance." Miss Caines recently died in Philadelphia, as the result of an accident in a picture. Charles Murray and C. L. Barr were respectively, Paul and Harry, in "Their One Good Suit." Pathe does not give casts.

R. S.—Dyed-in-the-wool fans would mock one who does not recognize Miss Alice Joyce, who played the nurse in "The Nurse at Mulberry Bend."

LOIS—Thanks for the letter. If we knew where to send a postcard——.

C. I.—Both scripts seem to have been held for further consideration and we would not worry for three full months. Edison takes from four to eight weeks to pass on a script, but they are entirely responsible and do not lose scripts. Be glad the story is held.

J. S.—The best reply we can give to your postcard request is the suggestion that you order a "Technique of the Photoplay." We cannot reply fully here.

J. B. E.—There are lots of things we could tell you, but you had better read the reply to J. S. just above. Why not join the Washington circle?

R. E.—Apply at the various studios for a position as an extra. Most companies hire direct, though a few book through an agency, in which case this information will be given you when you apply. The pay varies; seventy-five cents being about the lowest paid.

C. A. L.—We are trying to forget that amateur actors' contest at the Exposition, and we have already forgotten the names of the winners. No company that we know of employed any of the contestants.

S. J. S.—The number of scripts accepted or rejected has nothing whatever to do with the ultimate chances of success. That is not dependent on the verdict of rejection, but entirely upon your inventiveness and your ability to stick. We think that in common with most beginners you fail to realize the vital importance of getting a really unusual plot as a foundation for a story. You must learn plotting before you can hope to succeed as a writer, and unless you are exceptionally clever, you must gain facility through practice. Your letter suggests an education and intelligence that should fit you for the work, but your last question indicates a bias that is apt to prove fatal to success if you let it influence you. If an actor can write a good story it is entirely "fair" for the editor to purchase it. Why not?

B. D.—In "A Shadow of the Past," J. B. Sherry was Col. Boyd, Miss Mildred Harris was Mildred, and Miss Anna, Little Gertrude. In "The Favorite Son," Charles Ray was Jim, and Miss Grace Cunard was Mollie. We do not place Bill.

Projection Department

Conducted by F. H. RICHARDSON

An Important Notice.

THE editor is occupying a position on the top of that tall stump again. He does not know what to do with regard to a series of questions which was proposed to be propounded through the Department, the first instalment of which has already been published.

The objection has been raised that such a series of questions, when combined with the publication of the answers thereto, would supply a complete method of enabling men to coach themselves for examination, by learning the answers without, possibly, fully understanding the subject. It seems to me this objection is valid and such a proposition might result in a great deal of harm. On the other hand, such a series of questions, if handled by organizations in the manner I have already suggested, could not but result in an immense amount of good. The problem now is what to do about the matter. This, to my mind, is an exceedingly important proposition. I would not hesitate for a minute if the questions and answers only reached genuine operators; that is to say, men now operating machines; but the trouble is that thousands who would like to be operators, but have not the necessary knowledge and training to secure a license, might, and doubtless would, use the questions to coach themselves so that they could pass, though their knowledge would still be limited to a lot of replies to questions learned by rote. So great is the advantage of this kind of a thing in the education of operators, that I would be glad to publish the questions and send the answers to unions or to individual operators, but for the fact that it would involve an enormous amount of labor and a very large expense, since the thing would cover probably a full year, and would doubtless require the employment of a separate stenographer to take care of the correspondence thus entailed. The total expense would, I believe, reach not less than $1,000, and might reach a great deal more than that if two or three thousand operators demanded replies to the questions, as well as a considerable number of unions. If the unions and individual operators are sufficiently interested, I would like to hear suggestions on this subject, and know just how the unions and individuals feel about it, and, if there is considerable desire for the questions and replies, some suggestions as to how this expense could be met.

I am willing to do the work, but I am not willing to pay out from $1,000 to $2,000 of my own money to accomplish even so highly a beneficial result. I am not a millionaire, and cannot afford it. Let me impress upon you that the course taken will depend very largely upon the number of unions and individuals heard from. In the meanwhile, the questions will be held in abeyance.

Projection Improvement.

Mr. Travis Rauch, New Orleans, La., writes:

> You ask about the conditions in this city and recently there was a short letter regarding same. We have some very good projection and some very bad, but the good is taking the lead—a condition every one is pleased with. Our latest and newest theater is the Tudor, owned by J. Pearce & Sons, who are now operating six theaters in New Orleans. I understand they are using Simplex machines. Their picture is steady and the light is brilliant; the projection is good. The inside of this house is of the Baronial type, and it is well lighted and ventilated. Is equipped with a fine pipe organ and has an orchestra. The house is reached through an arcade some 75 feet in length, and the entrance is in keeping with the rest of the house. The screen is of radium gold fibre about 16 feet wide. New Orleans should certainly feel proud of this theater. First run licensed service is used. The latest stunt in some houses is to give three reels for five cents, though in some parts of town four and five reels are shown for that sum, supplemented by a few vaudeville (?) acts.
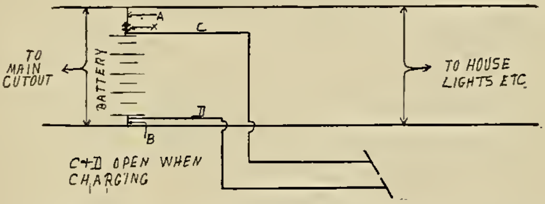
> Apropos of the "joke on us all"; on page 143 of the Handbook is a diagram of an auto-transformer; now while the "joke on us all" called it an economizer, would he have it connected right if it was an auto-transformer? On page 164 is another connection in which line A goes to the machine, and B to the arc; also a lead comes from mid-way between the two coils to the arc, which is nearly the same as he had his "economizer," but, for argument sake, would he have had it connected right had it been an auto-transformer?

There is very little similarity between the connections named. Of course, if the device had been a plain choke coil, then his connection would have been all right, since the choke coil is connected exactly the same as is a rheostat, but the connection of a transformer, or even an auto-transformer, is quite different in its effect, as well as, to some extent, mechanically. My understanding was, however, that the gentleman had a Hallberg economizer. I am glad to know that projection in New Orleans is improving, but from another letter, just received, I am led to believe there is still very great room for improvement indeed. The good will not lead very heavily if salaries range from $5 to $22, with very few getting the latter sum.

Storage Battery Problem.

Montfort, Wisconsin, writes:

> In our theater we have our own private light plant of 110 volts. Wishing to eliminate the losses in the rheostat we thought of changing the dynamo from 110 volts d. c. to 70 volts d. c., but in doing this we will have to install complete sets of lights and ventilating fans of different voltage from those we have. To avoid doing this we hit on this possible plan: To buy a 110-volt storage battery and tapping the battery from the middle we have 55 volts. Between the neutral wire and either outer wire, by the use of the DPDT switch, we may use any side of the battery, getting use of the current without the use of a rheostat. This would allow us still to keep all of the lights and fans. Here are a few questions I want to ask: 1. Would it be necessary to have end cells with which to keep up the required voltage? 2. While using the arc on one side of battery, would the dynamo assist the cells being discharged through the remaining set or would the remaining set be charging during the operation? 3. What size ampere hour battery would we need? 4. Would we still have to use a small rheostat in series with the arc? 5. Would it be difficult to insert ammeters in the circuit to keep track of the charge and discharge? In looking through your handbook I find no mention of storage battery for operation of arc or in any way used, but find the handbook very handy in locating any troubles.



In the first place, you could not connect a storage battery directly across 110 volt lines without resistance between. Therefore, it would be necessary in charging to connect resistance at X, since otherwise your batteries would charge so fast that the plates would buckle. You could not charge and use the battery for projection at the time time, but during use would be obliged to cut it out by means of a switch at A and one at B, C and D. Your storage battery would have to be of sufficient size to deliver the 25 amperes you wish to use, and deliver it at 60 volts, and sufficient resistance would have to be inserted at the line at Y to consume the extra voltage; this much resistance would be necessary in order to steady the arc and prevent possible injury to the battery when striking the arc. It would be impractical to use a storage battery without some resistance. I have redrawn your sketch as it was wrong in several important items. You could not connect in the middle as you proposed to, except that you used only one-half of the battery at a time. To connect as you had it would short circuit the battery. I do not think you would find this kind of plant at all satisfactory and I would by no means advise its installation. You had better get the 70-volt outfit, and do things right.

Simple to Determine.

Mr. John T. Hendry, owner and manager of Hendry's Grand Theater, Fort Myers, Fla., has trouble as follows:

> Shadows on overhead ceiling and proscenium walls follow the movement of the pictures. Am using mirroroide screen and have been unable to decide as to whether these shadows are caused by reflection from the curtain, or rays of light through the lens, though it does not seem possible that the light rays would throw these shadows to the sides and overhead. I have my screen surrounded with black, as per your Handbook instructions, but the shadow shows distinctly on the wings and ceiling, which are painted green.

The light rays from the lens itself could not possibly be diverted in the manner shown unless there was oil or something on the front lens, in which case the picture itself would be out of focus in spots. It is possible, however, that these rays could come from some other source, such as the condenser mount, but this could be easily determined by very simple experiments. If the light spots (you call them shadows) vary in intensity as the films change—that is to say if they are brilliant when a light scene is on and less intense when a dark scene is on, then they are undoubtedly caused by reflection from the screen. The matter is easy to determine.

Dowser Behind the Condenser.

Waynesville, N. C., writes:

> How about putting a dowser, similar to the one in front of the condenser, behind the lens—between it and the arc, so that when the lamphouse door is open the cold air will not strike the lens directly? Why don't we hear more from the North Carolina operators? Are the boys in this section all dead? If so, let us hope they will come to life.

Theoretically a dowser behind the condenser would be excellent, practically it would be somewhat difficult to arrange. I think brother Woods' (Frisco) idea is by far the best thing I have seen to date. It appears in one of the recent issues. We will be glad to hear from the North Carolina men at any time. I do not think they are dead by any manner of means, but possibly sleeping.

A Reply.

Mr. Joseph S. Pare, New York, replies, as to "the problem," page 426, July 26, as follows:

> If the current flowing through the rheostat was of such value as to cause the drop in voltage to be exactly 110 volts at all times, no matter what the load on the transformer might be, then it would be no disadvantage, beyond a waste of energy, to connect the rheostat in series with the primary of the transformer on a 220 volt circuit. With 110 volts drop in the rheostat this would leave 110 volts for the primary, as required. However, the current flowing through the primary will vary according to the current in the secondary, and, since the ratio of voltage is practically two to one, therefore with, for example, 60 amperes in the secondary, there will be only 30 amperes in the primary. Now, this 30 amperes flowing through the rheostat would cause a greater drop in voltage than 110, so that the primary would not receive current at 110 volts, which would, in turn, decrease the secondary voltage, and, therefore, the operation of such an arrangement would not be satisfactory, due to the variation in arc resistance. Also as you only have a rheostat designed for 25 amperes, if more than that quantity is allowed to flow through, there will be excessive heating in the rheostat. It is impossible to connect any given resistance in series with the primary of the transformer, so that there will always be the required drop in voltage across such resistance. For this reason the transformer should always be used on the voltage for which it was intended. If the rheostat was connected in series with the secondary side of the economizer, it would simply limit the value of the current which would flow through the secondary circuit, provided such a current did not exceed the capacity of the rheostat used. Connecting the rheostat in the secondary circuit would not cause any variation with regard to the voltage at the terminals of the secondary coils. It would, however, change the voltage at the arc and, hence, the amperage. Yes, as you stated in a recent issue of the Department, many specialists could show you things, but very few of these specialists could teach practical common sense as you do. You are doing wonderfully well; keep up the good work. We need just such a man as yourself in this world of "must-know-it-or-get-out." Why is it so many operators refuse to have their names and addresses published? I think it ought to be done in order to show who is who. Am anxious to know what Mr. Hallberg will say with regard to the rheostat-transformer matter.

Many thanks for your kind words, brother Pare. My opinion is, broadly speaking, that your answer is quite correct. I will have Mr. Hallberg express his views in due course of time.

From New Orleans.

New Orleans, La., orders a Handbook and writes:

> On July 12 issue, page 203, the Pickwick Club, Sussex, New Brunswick, complained of condenser breakage with the motiograph. I had the same trouble until I inserted a piece of asbestos board, held up by four bolts, in the lamp house about an inch from the top, as I found there was not sufficient ventilation; since then I have not broken a single condenser. Some time ago you asked about conditions in New Orleans. There are about 110 moving picture theaters here, some of which run straight pictures, and some pictures and vaudeville; also some of them use a spotlight song. Although projection is fair, there is room for improvement. Personally, I think that New Orleans is the home of the crank grinder, who cannot get a job anywhere else. (Wow! fireworks due from New Orleans. Ed.). We have the General Film Company, the Consolidated Film Company, and the Mutual Film Company, as well as two or three junk exchanges. By the latter term I mean exchanges that buy up old copies of film. Salaries are very poor. On an average a man working from six to eight hours a day (two shifts) gets from $15 to $22. Operators who are working in suburban theaters from about 6:30 to 10:30 p. m. get on an average $1 per night and ten cents car fare, or in other words about $8 a week, although some work for still less than this, even as low as $4 or $5. If a man asks for an increase he is promptly let out and another crank grinder installed. A union was organized something like three months ago and has approximately thirty members, but the managers, as a rule, are fighting the organization by promptly discharging union men as soon as it is found that they are union men. If there are any national organizers one of them certainly ought to be sent down here. Ever since the union was in existence the claim has been made that they would get their charter in two weeks, but, so far as I know, it has not yet been received. One drawback is that there was a union organized here seven or eight years ago, but as it paid the men while they were out of a job some would not work when they could get it, but simply lived off the organization. This makes many, myself among them, leary about joining again, as they fear a like result. They not only run the chance of losing their money, but also the chance of being promptly fired, and there are always half a dozen crank grinders running around ready to take a man's place, so you can see our predicament. I have an operating room 8 x 8 x 7 feet, project a 14-inch picture at 98 feet; have a 12-inch exhaust fan in operating room, but no vent flue. Now do not imagine I am a kicker, I am merely setting forth things as I see them.

I have published this letter because if conditions are anything even approaching those set forth, then New Orleans needs a good big shaking up. If the statements contained are wrong then they can easily be corrected. If they are right then it is even more to the interest of the managers themselves than to the operators that they be corrected. What does a "manager" expect to get on his screen when he employs an "operator" at the "salary" named in this letter for suburban houses? The business of exhibiting moving pictures is discredited by this kind of a performance; the business of exhibiting moving pictures demands that a man of ability be employed in the operating room, and you cannot get men of ability at $5, $6, $8 or $10 a week; that is a cinch. True, the house may only run during the evening, but the operator must make his living during those hours, nevertheless, since he cannot work by day and then from 6:30 to nearly midnight, and if he did he could not give even half way decent services on either job. Certainly there must be something wrong with conditions when a letter of this kind, emanating from one who is evidently a man of intelligence, is received, and a man who is also one of the older New Orleans' operators. I shall send this letter to International President Shay, and I certainly hope that he will take steps to bring the organization in New Orleans to a point where the crank turners and ten dollar operator will be eliminated. Real managers will welcome this, or, at least will be mighty glad it is done after it is done, and the others do not count. What an alleged union did ten years ago must not be used as a standard to judge the acts of an I. A. T. S. E. union of today.

Joining the Union.

Quanah, Tex., writes:

> What chance is there for an out-of-town operator joining the Union? I would like very much to, but there seems no chance. Can an operator get a State license in the State of Texas? If so, where can it be obtained?

I have referred your letter to President Shay, with request that he communicate with you. I do not believe the State of Texas issues operators' licenses. I think that only some of the large Texas cities do. The Handbook you ordered has gone forward.

Fine Operating Room.

Mr. W. B. Martin, manager Modesto Theater, Modesto, Cal., writes:

> I ran across the sketch on page 486 of your issue of May 3, 1913, under the heading, "A joke on us all." In the issue of June 14, page 1132, you criticise Kansas in his solution, saying that both wires of the feeding system should pass through the economizer. That is true, only in the case where the current saver is a transformer and not a choke coil. His connection is correct for a choke coil, the only thing that I would change being his pilot light for the machine. It should be connected at I, although it would burn full in the present position when the arc is not burning, and dim when it is. The brother may have one of the older style current savers, such as the Miles Rheostaticide, in which event his connections were correct. More anon, and later a photo of one of the best operating rooms you have ever seen; running water, toilet, plenty of space, two Powers 6A machines, dissolver, rectifier, choke coil, spotlight—in fact the best obtainable of everything. Wish you could see my house here. It would be a good sight for sore eyes.

It is always a pleasure to look at good operating rooms and theaters, though I'm not troubled with "sore eyes." The operating room is the very keystone of the whole theater, and keystones ought to be made out of good material. If they are too small, or of poor material, then there is likely to be trouble. Friend Martin's comments on the "joke on us all" are correct. Glad to hear from him again and trust we shall thus be favored in the near future.

Upside Down.

Our old friend, Harry G. Waldron, proprietor of the Langdon and Electric Theaters, Langdon, N. D., calls attention to the fact that figure 100, page 211 of the Handbook is up-side down, and that the letters J and K, in B, figure 135, page 347, are reversed. He then continues:

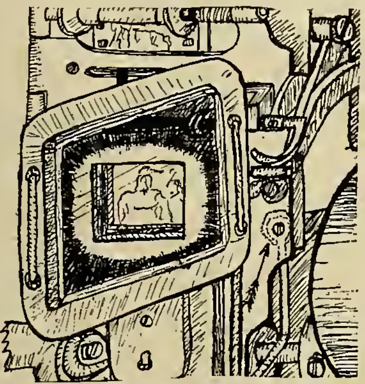
> I will contribute what seems an insignificant idea, although it has served to steady my picture noticeably. The upper reel of my Motiograph was constantly jerking as it unwound. This was sometimes sufficiently heavy to cause a vibration of the entire mechanism, and the picture would jump on the screen. This jumping, while not great, was readily apparent to a "moving picture eye," and it was unnecessary. I secured a piece of clock spring—the end which had a wire loop riveted to it. Filing off this loop left a hole by which the spring was riveted into the magazine in such shape and position that it rubbed the reel very lightly at the edge, just enough to keep it checked down to speed.

The upper reel should always have some tension, to prevent this jerking; it is supposed to be provided in the magazine itself, and I supposed all magazines were thus equipped. The Powers has a sort of spring arrangement on the inside of the door, which clamps the reel lightly when the door is closed. As many times as I have looked at the Handbook, I have never noticed that cut being upside down, but it is all right, and Hoffman, I guess, is the goat. Owners of Handbooks will make the letter correction in pencil, putting the J where the K is and vice versa, and take note of the cut.

Spot Shield.

Mr. J. Roy Hunt, Gadsden, Alabama, submits sketch of his light shield, with the following description:

> Am enclosing sketch of shield for the spot, to be used on the Power's machine. Have not seen anything like it, therefore, will give the boys a chance to try it out; it is certainly a relief to the eyes. Take the glass and frame out of the blind side of a Power's lamphouse, fastening a piece of tin over the hole in the lamphouse door. Next get an old bicycle spoke and put through the hole in the frame and bend so as to hold the ruby glass in place. To use both ruby and green makes the spot too dim. Bend the other end around so as to fit in the gate and bolt with screw just under the gate latch. This kind of screen takes an enormous amount of strain away; hence, it is of great value.



During the past three years, and also in the first edition of the handbook, I have illustrated and described schemes of this kind, though not just as friend Hunt has it. I would suggest, however, that the use of the green glass would prove more satisfactory than the use of the ruby. The shield, of course, stands at right angles to the gate—the only thing which is not quite clear in the drawing. It took me a couple of minutes to dope that out, since it looked like Brother Hunt had the thing set crooked and directly over the aperture, which, of course, would be impossible.

Operator in Error.

Mr. S. J. Whyte, one of the proprietors of the A-Muse-U Theater, Kosciusko, Miss., writes:

> We started a moving picture show some eight months ago with a regular licensed operator. This man trained our present operator, who has made good, but I cannot get him away from some of the ideas of his predecessor, one of which is as follows: We scarcely ever run more than six reels (Simplex machine, which takes a 12-inch carbon above) and he insists on re-trimming every night, taking an upper carbon 8 to 10 inches long out and using it for a lower. I claim that this is extravagant and that the carbon would run two shows, or twelve reels, and give a better light than the first night, due to less resistance in the shortened carbon. Who is right?

I don't quite understand what you are driving at, brother Whyte. Your statement means that you are running six reels and only using from two to four inches each of carbon in the process. If this is so, you must be using a very very weak light, but, in any event, I see no earthly reason why the operator should take out eight or ten inches of top carbon and put it in the bottom. He could not use a ten-inch stub in the bottom, therefore must break off some, and that represents waste. Also, assuming you are using d. c., I think you will get better results by using a ½ solid projection carbon below, and a ⅝ cored above. The old upper carbon will give just as good light as it ever did, and, of course, as you say, there will be somewhat less resistance, hence a little increase in amperage as the carbon burns away. If you are using only three or four inches of carbon a night, I would suggest that a six-inch carbon might be better, but, in any event, if your amperage is only strong enough to consume that much carbon in running six reels, the resistance of the carbon does not amount to much one way or another.

Transformer Probably Overloaded.

Messrs. Block & Co., Brooklyn, write:

> Last year we opened a house in Queens, L. I., taking current through an outside pole transformer, which reduced the voltage to 110. We were the only ones taking current through this transformer and our light burned up to candlepower. At present three stores are also taking through this transformer and our projection light seems to be somewhat poor, although we are now using the high notch of our inductor. What we want to know is, will this additional load operate to produce this effect?

Provided the transformer is not large enough to supply all this load, it would. The thing to do is to have the light company test the voltage of the secondary of the transformer when the load is all on. If it is less than 110, then the transformer is overloaded and there should be a larger one installed at once.

Wrong Focal Length Condensers.

Mr. James Vetter, Staunton, Iowa, has trouble as follows:

> Am having difficulty in getting a clear light. When the corners of the pictures are clear there is a dark spot in the center of the screen. I think the trouble lies in the lens, and have tried everything I can think of. What size lens should be used in my machine? I am projecting an eight foot 6 inch picture at 54 feet, with one 6½ and one 7½ condenser.

If your picture is 8½ feet at 54, you are using a six inch e. f. objective, and should have two 7½ condensing lenses. By using these lenses and sliding your lamp-house backward and forward, until the right point is reached, your screen should be cleared up. I would suggest, friend Vetter, that you procure a copy of the Handbook. You will find the lens proposition very clearly explained therein.

Enormous Investment.

How many of you have ever stopped to think of the total value of the equipment placed in the charge of operators in this country?

The moving picture theaters in the United States and Canada are estimated from 10,000 to 17,000. At a conservative guess I should say that the total might reach 12,500 for the two countries, and that these theaters own and use not less than 15,000 projection machines. Undoubtedly there are enough projectors used in schools, colleges, governmental, and other work to bring the total up to at least 20,000. Assuming the average value of these machines to be $225 each, and the other operating equipment to amount, on an average, to $75 per theater, we have a total of $300 for each house, or $6,000,000 worth of property placed directly in the charge of the operators of the United States and Canada. Quite a respectable amount, is it not? Bear in mind these estimates are very conservative. The total will, I believe, run much higher than this, possibly as high as $8,000,000.

The New York American, of August 9, gives the total value of projecting machines now in use in this country as $10,000,000, but this is, I believe, excessive, as is their estimate of the photoplay theaters in the United States, 17,420, with a realty value of $348,400,000. The article in question gives the number of moving picture employees in the United States as 200,000, with a weekly payroll of $2,300,000. It gives the total investment in the moving picture business in this country as $500,000,000, and the total number of employees as more than a quarter of a million people. It gives the property value of the producing plants as $100,000,000, and says that the producing manufacturers employ more than 20,000 people with a weekly payroll of $750,000, and states the weekly output is about 70,000,000 feet of film produced at a cost of $1,250,000, for which the exhibitor pays $6,500,000, though whether the American writer means by this that the exhibitors pay this or that it is the sum paid in rental, I do not know. I think the New York American's figures are excessive, though that is only a guess on my part; but, in any event, it is something of a business we are connected with, is it not?

A well known Parisian statistician estimates the output of films throughout the world as amounting to 300,000 meters per day, or more than 100,000,000 a year (a meter is 3¼ feet). This writer estimates the annual receipts of American moving picture houses at $55,000,000.

Some Questions.

Mr. Ray E. Crockett, Bethel, Maine, comes forward with the following:

> I have a motor-driven Power's 6A, projecting a twelve-foot picture at about 50 feet. What would cause the carbons suddenly to turn red and to flame after burning correctly for some time? The carbons are ⅝ and the amperage 40. I carry about a 3/16 arc and feed regularly. Am using a straight up and down set, with the lower carbon slightly advanced, and the whole lamp tilted at about 60 degrees.
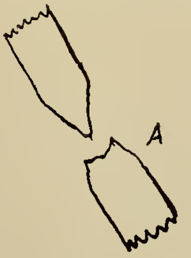
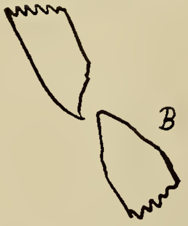
> The arc burns as per sketch. After the light has burnt as per A for a little while, it will burn as per the B, and the light is good. The upper carbon generally burns pointed when the lights are red. The center of my picture is brighter than the ends. What causes this? Am using 6½ rear, and 7½ front condensers. When the light is bad the carbons seem full of cracks.





Here is a new one with a vengeance. If your drawings are correct, neighbor Crockett, the only possible explanation is that your polarity is reversed, and the only explanation I see that would account for the condition is that your feeders are switched to different generators at different times and that the generators are of opposite polarity. I presume, of course, that you are using d. c., since the sketches seem to indicate this. You had better get after the powerhouse on this proposition. If I were you I would try two 6½ condensers. Possibly they will clear up your screen; also have your condensers set so they are square with each other, and with their convex surfaces almost touching.

Troublesome Trouble.

Mr. H. H. Rolison, one of the owners of the Pastime Theater, Troy, Pa., has trouble as follows:

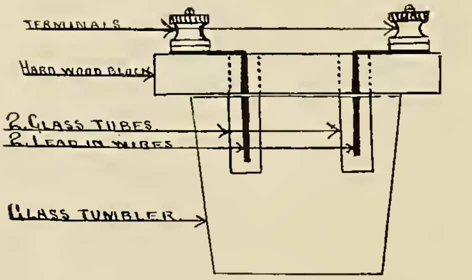
> Our picture seems to swing sideways on the screen, and there is an up and down movement. The machine is securely fastened to a concrete floor. Current is 110 volt through a Power's inductor. We have a two-wing shutter. Power's 6A.

Try your intermittent sprocket and see if it has any side motion. If it has, loosen the set screw in the collar in the intermittent sprocket shaft next to the inside end of the left hand bushing and with a screwdriver point, using the rim of the sprocket as a fulcrum, pry the collar over to the left against the bushing, at the same time tightening the set screw. See that the roller flanges 691, figure 116 of the Handbook, hug the film closely. If they do not, then drive out spindle 692, figure 116, and stretch spring 729, figure 116, slightly filing one end of the sleeve between the two flanges, if necessary, to make it shorter. Don't overdo this, however, or the film will ride on top of the flanges, instead of between them as it should. In one of these two things I think you will find your trouble, provided, however, the machine itself does not sway sideways. It is also possible, though improbable, that your intermittent shaft is sprung. If the up and down movement occurs regularly four times to each revolution of the crank, then (a) the sprocket is not true. (b) Dirt on face of sprocket. (c) Intermittent shaft sprung. If the jump is irregular and intermittent, then (a) the tension is not tight enough. (b) Intermittent sprocket teeth worn. (c) Bushings worn.

Polarity Indicator.

Winston-Salem, N. C., contributes an excellent sketch of a polarity indicator, and writes:

> Referring to sketch of polarity indicator I sent in, published in one of the March issues, will say that there are many methods for testing for positive and negative poles which should only be tried by experienced electricians. One brother recommends the potato test, which I used for several years successfully. The attached sketch, however, shows a cheap and effective tester, which can be used by anyone.



> To use this device, fill the glass with water, in which a tablespoonful of salt has been dissolved. When the current has been switched on, fine bubbles of gas will be given off from the negative wire.

This seems to be one of the best testers I have ever seen, when its simplicity, ease of construction and cheapness are considered. Many thanks for this contribution.

Exhibitors Welcome.

May M. Pettengill, of Pettengill & Pettengill, theatrical managers, Eureka, Cal., writes:

> I do not know whether or not I am entitled to ask questions, as I am only an exhibitor. My operator, however, does not seem to overcome a trouble, therefore I seek your advice. What condensers would you use with a motiograph lamp using current through a rectifier, with about 30 amperes to the arc? The throw is 58 feet, with a 15 foot picture on a plain white wall. We used two 6½ condenser lens and have tried a 6½ next to the arc, and a 7½ in front. We get a better light with the two 6½, but the picture seems to draw the eyes and make a strain. The 6½ and 7½ does not do this, but does not make a sharp picture. We take great interest in our pictures and are not satisfied unless we have the very best in projection. We have our operators try out all new things, and this may have something to do with the fact that we have built, owned and operated five successful theaters in this section. We never, however, ran across this condenser trouble until we built this house a few months ago.

If your figures are correct you are using a 3½ inch e. f. objective, which would call for two 6½ condensers. I cannot, however, understand why there should be any such effect as you have described. You have got me on that proposition. If any one of our readers can offer any suggestions as to this unique trouble, we would be glad to hear from them, for it is one I never heard of before. The only possible thing I can think of is that when you put the two 6½ lenses in you do not move the lamp house closer toward the aperture, and that you have it so far back that you are using the back focus. Evidence of this would be a spot somewhat square in shape, fringed all around with light blue, but I never knew even this condition to produce the effect you set forth. Most certainly exhibitors are just as welcome to the Department as operators. The Department has many exhibitor contributors.

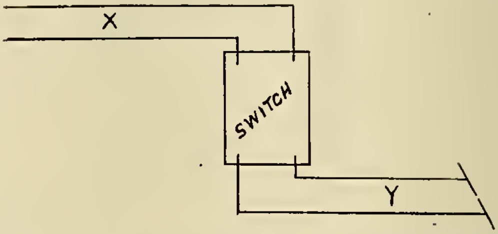
Voltmeter and Ammeter.

I desire to again call the attention of managers and operators to the desirability and advisability, from any and every point of view, of equipping their operating room with a reliable voltmeter and ammeter—particularly the latter. The voltmeter is a great convenience, but no operating equipment is complete without a good ammeter. This instrument should be located on the wall directly in front of the operator, and in my opinion it will save its own price in a very short time, as well as enable the operator to produce better results. But bear in mind that should be located right beside the observation port, or between the observation ports, if there are two machines used. After a long search I have finally located a thoroughly reliable ammeter and voltmeter which sells for a very reasonable figure.

Powers Motor Connection.

Mr. Robert Brummet, Jellico, Tenn., orders a Handbook and writes:

> Why does the N. Power Company connect the machine motor to the operating switch when the motor is for 110 volts, and you know that the arc voltage is only about 48? What do you know about the mining camps? I was recently called on to set up a machine in a camp and it was a motor drive. It looks as though these little camps were getting ahead of the large cities with regard to up-to-date equipment.



The connection is all right if the transformer or rheostat is placed as it should be. The whole difficulty lies in the fact that some operators make the mistake of connecting their resistance or transformer in at X instead of at Y, as it should be. This, of course, throws the resistance ahead of the switch, placing the motor on the arc voltage, which is wrong. If the transformer, or resistance, is placed at Y, the motor will be on 110 volts, or whatever the line pressure may be.

Get a New Part.

Mr. O. J. Bilodean, Stevens Point, Wis., writes:

> Can a cam shaft pinion on an Edison Model B be removed? The pinion on my shaft is pretty well worn. I certainly agree with Mr. Harman, of Vancouver, August 2 issue, as to small town operators joining the Union. What have you to say to pictures pasted on the walls of operating rooms?

Certainly the pinion can be removed. You will find directions for its removal on page 237 of the Handbook, instructions Nos. 24 and 25. I see no particular objection to pictures being hung, or even pasted on the walls of the operating room, if the operator wants them there, except that the Underwriters allow nothing inflammable inside the operating room, and further provided the pictures are appropriate. Personally, I prefer the walls of the operating room to be painted a dead black.

The Ghost Laid.

Mr. S. J. Harris, Tonkawa, Oklahoma, killed his ghost thusly:

> I see in recent issues that several of the operators are bothered with that infernal nuisance, a ghost. I fought the ghost proposition for three years right here in Tonkawa. I did everything I could think of, including calling it all the names the dictionary could supply, and then wrote the department, and was told to do just what I had done. I was taking current through what was called a Silver Saver. I got my manager to try the Fort Wayne compensarc and there have been no ghosts since.

I trust the Fort Wayne people won't get mad about this. Blue Beard killed his wives, it is said, with a cleaver; neighbor Harris has killed his ghost with a compensarc—and there you are.

Operators Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

"AN INDIAN'S LOYALTY" (Biograph), August 16.—A melodramatic picture with a situation that the Biograph Company has made use of a great many times, but nearly always with freshness and nearly always effectively, as in the present case. It is a situation where there is money in the house and only a girl to protect it, and the bad man attempts to force her to disclose its hiding place. As usual there are rescuers on the way, and it also includes a speedy Biograph chase. The photography is clear.

"THE PIED PIPER OF HAMELIN" (Edison), August 16.—Illustrating Browning's well-known poem. This picture is commendable, especially to those who have not seen a former version of it made by an independent company, which was much better in every way. In this the story is clear and told with a measure of effectiveness, but very little dramatic color has been added by the adapter and producer. The character of the little lame child which in the former picture, little Marie Eline, "the Thanhouser kid," filled with human significance, has been reduced to an empty figure in this picture. At times its producer, George Lessey, has not escaped a certain staginess. The photography is fair.

"THE MAN IN THE CABIN" (Essanay), August 16.—These Broncho Billy pictures continue to be widely popular, and the reason is doubtless in the vivid way G. M. Anderson and his company produce them. The story in this case has, as often in these Western pictures, been told before. It is, however, commendable as a fair offering and the photography is acceptable.

"THE ESCAPE" (Kalem), August 16.—This picture offers a very interesting contrast. On one side are pictures of a prisoner in stripes escaping, on the other, children playing about a farm. It is a farm boy, fond of wild west literature and playing with a lasso, who suddenly finds real need of his rope. At the same time he saves his little sister whom the bad man is using as a shield to keep his pursuers from shooting. The farm scenes with the children are bright and full of poetry and the picture makes an acceptable offering.

"DREGS" (Lubin), August 16.—In a very vague way this picture tells a story. It is not at all clear and we do not see how it can furnish very much entertainment to the average spectator. It is only 400 feet in length, however, and on the same reel with it is a laughable farce. It was written by George Terwilliger and produced by Joseph Smiley.

"SURPRISE FOR FOUR" (Lubin), August 16.—On the same reel with the foregoing is this farce after the Lubin pattern, with some good jokes that are fresh. It made much laughter and the audience seemed pleased with it. The author is E. W. Sargent and Arthur Hotaling the producer.

"THE TURNING POINT" (Patheplay), August 16.—A melodrama in which there is continuous action, and it seemed to hold the attention of the audience. It has a situation that is not at all new. We find an adventuress set by crooks to win the confidence of a millionaire. She falls in love with him, and desires to escape stealing from him his great treasure which, in this picture, is a painting. As usual, the millionaire rescues her from the crooks and marries her. It is not very convincing, but has been told with backgrounds that suggest wealth and a pleasant life, and these the audience generally like. The photography is good and in some of the leading effects very beautiful.

"THE WORK HABIT" (Biograph), August 21.—A comedy in which there is a good idea, but which isn't worked up in the most effective way; for it is not made, as a whole, convincing. Dad (Lionel Barrymore) has worked all his life and is well enough off to take a holiday; but keeps on working. His daughter in the city thinks that she and her husband can make it so pleasant for Dad that he will forget his old habit of working. It isn't shown that they make any real effort to please him and soon he is looking for a job. One wonders why he didn't go back to the farm. There is too little life in it to make it a very good offering; but there are some good things in it.

"THE SHERIFF OF COCHISE (Essanay), August 21.—A very interesting picture and a first-class offering. It has a new character who, we feel very sure, will appeal strongly to the public, and it has a story that will hold the interest well. The name of the player who takes the sheriff's role is not known to us. But he pictures the character on a search for a couple of horse thieves amusingly and his droll way of circumventing the crooks is fresh and very entertaining. It makes what is perhaps the best offering of to-day's regular releases.

"THE LAND OF FIRE, NEW ZEALAND" (Melies), August 21.—A picture of the marvelous natural wonders found in New Zealand, and geysers, hot springs and the like. It is clearly photographed and was warmly applauded by a large audience in the City Theater on Fourteenth Street, New York. Audiences seem to appreciate all kinds of topical and travel offerings except those made by some dry-minded behind a camera. In this picture there is action and a kind of suspense; for while one looks at a geyser he never knows just what he is going to see next.

"A MAID OF MANDALAY" (Vitagraph), August 21.—Illustrating Kipling's Mandalay song, this picture needs the music to give it life. We saw it accompanied by the usual drumming on the piano and it fell very flat; but it has this quality that it does illustrate the words and sentiment of the song, and the two together should go very well. It was taken by the Vitagraph travelers in Mandalay; was written by James Young, and produced by Maurice Costello, who also plays the role of the British soldier. Clara Kimball Young is not very effective as the Burma girl who prays to the idol; but is more so than W. V. Ranous, as her father. The backgrounds are often full of interest. It is clearly photographed.

"FATE FASHIONS A LETTER" (Selig), August 21.—A picture that tells a good story smoothly and effectively. It plainly pleased the audience and there was some applause when it became clear that the hero was to arrive in time to save the heroine from being robbed. The fashioning of the letter from the wife to her husband, so that when partly burned its meaning, as much of it as he can get, alarms him and brings him home in time to nab the burglar, is clever and convincing. The backgrounds are fresh and add a pleasing touch to the offering as a whole. Will M. Richtey is the author of the script, which was produced by Fred Huntly. Hobart Bosworth plays the chief role, a detective who leaves home to hunt a criminal. His wife (Eugenie Besserer) receives some money and a clever crook (Henry Otto) breaks in and demands it. But her letter has called her husband home and he finds in the burglar the very man he was looking for. A good offering.

"STUNG" (Patheplay), August 21.—A good farcical situation does not wholly save this picture from the deadening effect of its unnatural, burlesqued characters. There was plenty of evidence that it did not greatly interest the audience. Spectators here in New York seem to be growing more inclined to express satisfaction or otherwise with their pictures. This offering has some good scenes and there was a little laughter, over the antics of the donkey.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY, August 21.—The editorial department of the mid-week topical heightens its value as an offering. It is always worth while and the ordinary items are worth seeing, too, even the least of them.

"THE TEN THOUSAND DOLLAR TOE" (Selig), August 20.—This rather silly and surely impossible comedy may amuse in some houses, although it is quite certain that the scene where the single young man vigorously rubs the bare foot of the single young woman will in some houses cause a demonstration that will be unpleasant to the more refined. On the same reel is an interesting scenic, "Scenes in Moroland."

"FIRST AID TO THE INJURED" (Edison), August 20.—This demonstration by the police force of Berkeley, Cal., is interesting to the average house as well as instructive; as to the latter especially so to those who may be in municipal authority. Berkeley was chosen for the demonstration as it was the pioneer city to give its police this instruction. On the same reel is "Bobbie's Long Trousers," a comedy that is not quite pointless. It endeavors to prove that a boy with short "pants" is permitted by the girls with whom he works to take liberties that are denied him when he appears in long trousers. In this instance the boy reverted to the abbreviated garment.

"STRANGE TRAITS OF SERPENTS" (Patheplay), August 20.—A most interesting as well as instructive illustration by Curator Raymond L. Ditmars of the Bronx Zoo, of the habits of some of the more deadly snakes. There are shown the fer-de-lance, American adder, Brazilian tree snake, king snake, a mongoose killing a snake, and a lot of rattlesnakes. Why did the company not give us a photograph of Mr. Ditmars? It would have been worth while. On the same reel is shown "Auto Polo—the New Thriller," pictures taken at the international contest held on Hempstead Plains.

"THE ACCIDENTAL BANDIT" (Essanay), August 20.—A short comedy that may amuse rural audiences. It did not audibly impress a morning city house. On the same reel is an industrial, "Making Hay With Modern Machinery," which will interest both city and country.

"BETTER DAYS" (Vitagraph), August 20.—In this short reel there is more real drama, in the opinion of this reviewer, than has been contained in any picture of the three days of the week. This is due to the work of Van Dyke Brooke, who not only directs the picture, but plays the lead. Mr. Brooks so interests little Sidney Cummings that the child sees only the tramp and forgets the camera, to which obviously he was little accustomed. There is deep pathos and a bit of delightful comedy as well—it is the laugh with a suspicion of a choke—in the scene where the tramp is taken by the child into the nursery, puts on with the little fellow the boxing gloves and rides the hobby horse. Rosemary Theby and Leo Delaney acceptably play the father and mother of the child. A. F. Clarke is the author of a story that at no time descends to the commonplace; the identity of the originals of the two photographs carried by the tramp remains unrevealed; the woman and child are not miraculously restored to the outcast. On the same reel is the travelogue, "In and About Calcutta."

"PLAYING THE PIPERS" (Vitagraph), August 22.—An amusing full reel comedy, which would have been even better as a half reel. The preparations were a little tedious, though many laughs came during the bagpipe contest. Hughey Mack and Dorothy Kelly played the leading roles. The fire which developed toward the close of the contest interfered with the humor and served no particular purpose so far as the story was concerned.

"THE LIZARD" (Patheplay), August 22.—Instructive views of green lizards in their native haunts. They feed upon caterpillars, shed their skins like snakes, and have a curious friendship for toads. A very interesting half reel.

"VISIT TO RUINS OF POMPEII" (Patheplay), August 22.—On same reel with above, a worth-while view of the buried city, now uncovered and restored in part. The scenes are in color and give a strikingly clear idea of the splendid civilization of that remote day. A good release.

"THE RAG BAG" (Lubin), August 22.—A bit of foolishness without any very definite idea back of it. The tramp gets into a rag bag and is sold with the rags by his friend. Very light comedy.

"SMASHING TIME" (Lubin), August 22.—This, on same reel with above, is more entertaining. The colored girl places a watch on her slipper, in imitation of her mistress. She attends a ball and a jealous girl gets her lover to smash the watch. This creates a rough-house among the darkies which is spirited and amusing. Real darkies were employed to give tone to the occasion.

"FOOL LUCK" (Kalem), August 22.—The young husbands, living in the same flat, both promise to bring their wages home. But both stop and buy lost baggage being auctioned off by the railroad. The developments are absurd and mildly amusing.

"DECEIVING UNCLE ASA" (Kalem), August 22.—This, on same reel with above, elicits more laughter than the other. It is the old proposition of the young man's friend dressing up as his wife in order to get uncle's money. This is better done than usual and is enjoyable.

"THE GOOD INDIAN" (Selig), August 22.—An ordinary Western release, telling a familiar story. The Indians go out on a raid and set fire to the cabin of the doctor and his wife. The good Indian comes to the rescue, being grateful to the wife for having saved his child's life. The burning of the cabin was the principal feature and this was considerably drawn out.

"THE BLIND BASKET WEAVER" (Kalem), August 25.—The situation has been used in a number of former pictures; yet a very slight twist has given it a measure of individuality and fresh interest. A lame girl (very well suggested by Alice Hollister) loves a blind basket weaver and has a rival. An operation on the blind man's eyes restores his sight and she prefers to let her rival become his chosen one rather than have him see her deformity. There are some good scenes; but the picture is not what could be called strongly acted. It is clearly photographed and makes a commendable offering, not a big one.

"A MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING" (Edison), August 25.—Two weaknesses keep this picture from having a "punch." The fact that it refuses to go the whole way and be simply an out-and-out melodrama with all the impossibilities of such keeps it from getting anywhere; it doesn't prove or rightfully end anything and so itself criticises the situation it chose. Then it is hardly probable that a bank clerk who looked as intelligent as Richard Tucker would lose ten thousand dollars in so inexcusable a way; it criticises nearly every character concerned in the plot. It is a very well staged offering and the chief players are all that could be desired. Bessie Learn has the romantic lead opposite to Richard Tucker. Robert Brower and William West play the friendly bank presidents. There is a bookkeeper in West's bank who deserves mention, but we don't know his name. May Abbey is a niece of President Brower and Benjamin Wilson is the minister. The script is by Dr. J. H. Landau and was produced by George Lessey.

"WHEN GLASSES ARE NOT GLASSES" (Vitagraph), August 25.—A farce with a good joke that seems perfectly new and is very enjoyable. The author, W. A. Tremayne, has skillfully prepared his plot to make the most of his joke. Along the way, as it were, the players, especially Hughie Mack, have added bits of character comedy that the audience plainly found amusing. There was a good deal of laughter and the offering can safely be recommended. It was produced by Van Dyke Brooke. Josie Sadler plays the widow to Charles Brown's wooer.

"HER WOODEN LEG" (Lubin), August 25.—In this picture a very slight plot gives the Lubin people of Producer Arthur Hotaling's Company a good chance to be entertaining in their delineation of farcial characters. Mae Hotely's asking on the street for "help in getting a wooden leg" amuses, because it has so plainly nothing to stand on. There is a good deal of fun in the offering that is not at all boisterous. There is, by the way, a corking chance for a good story of sentiment in the picture's idea. The script was written by Epes Winthrop Sargent.

"ON THE DUMB WAITER" (Lubin), August 25.—A farce that entertained the audience very well. Robert Fisher plays a "boob" who goes in his night shirt to the dumb waiter for some groceries ordered by his wife (Eleanor Blanchard) and the door slams. He begs of his neighbor, a married woman (Peggie O'Neil), to let him crawl along her fire escape. He is seen by the woman's husband (Robert Drouet) and there is trouble which has a comical ending. It was produced by Joseph Smiley.

"THE CROOK AND THE GIRL" (Biograph), August 25.—The story told by this picture is unusually weak for a Biograph. In it the heiress falls in love with her new gardener and he a crook who has been payed by the villain to get employment at her house to steal a paper from her which will deprive her of her inheritance. Then the author didn't carefully guard our sympathies away from the villain of the story who, as the rich man's nephew, was counted heir until the girl came and, so it seems, supplanted him without good cause. The hiding of the will was not strong, nor was the snatching of the first will from the old man by the nephew in an early act. One can make a will as many times as one pleases. It is a well acted offering and has some beautifully lighted scenes and some good photography. Claire McDowell is the girl; Harry Carey, the crook; Lionel Barrymore, the nephew; Hector Dion, the butler, etc.

"PATHE'S WEEKLY" August 25.—Several of the items this Monday are not so clear as could be desired. Of course, enough is shown to make the topical of great interest.

"THE REFORMED OUTLAW" (Lubin), August 26.—Romaine Fielding generally produces from the shoulder; he uses situations that are sometimes as in this case not wholly new and puts them over freshly by the vigor of his handling. We enjoyed this picture and the audience seemed to like it; but it was helped by the poorness of what went before it. It is the old story of the girl and the outlaw, but there is a fresh way of doing things and of looking at things in it and a very acceptable note of sincerity that makes it entertaining. Mr. Fielding probably never sees anything mechanically. Mary Ryan, the girl, also has a habit of being brand new Jose Robinson plays the outlaw.

"THE ADVENTURES OF A WATCH" (Selig), August 26.—The story is really foolish. Careful production and playing can do little to save such a plot.

"THEY WERE ON THEIR HONEYMOON" (Selig).—On the same reel is this picture with a decidedly far fetched situation for a comedy; but there is fun in it. Some of its scenes are amusing, taken by themselves, and being very clearly photographed are pretty. Mrs. Owen Bronson is the author and the producer is Charles France. Palmer Bowman and Alma Russell play a newly married couple who to win a bet take a strange way to enjoy their honeymoon.

"A MISTAKE IN JUDGMENT" (Edison), August 26.—A very good picture by M. B. Havey of a young boy's background. It is a sincere story, full of human sympathy and with that understratum of humor that true insight nearly always gives. It is out of the ordinary run of pictures and appealed to us more than any offering in a long while. The boy is a natural youngster and his parents don't understand him very well, so he has a hard time of it until things get too rough for his sense of justice and he runs away for a day and has a good time in a boy's way. We hope to see other pictures by Mr. Havey—who very clearly is a human being. The picture has been sympathetically produced by Charles M. Seay. Yale Boss carried the lead effectively and naturally. Charles Sutton and Mrs. Williams play his parents. It is very well photographed.

"A DOLL FOR THE BABY" (Vitagraph), August 26.—An Independent company made a picture some time ago that resembled this closely and did it even more effectively. The main idea is the race of cow punchers through dangerous miles to get for a sick baby a doll which the doctor thinks will save her life. She is the idol of the ranch and had set her heart on the doll when she was taken sick. Many who have not seen the story will be entertained by it. There is some hard riding and an attack of hostile Indians who try to wipe out the punchers who are bringing the doll. It was produced by W. J. Bauman.

"THE LOVE THEFT" (Essanay), August 26.—A good many people will like the story of this picture. It finds pathetic sentiment in the case of the old clerk (T. J. Commerford) who absentmindedly puts in his pocket a picture of "his little sweetheart," the very little girl (Eleanor Kahn) of his employer (Jules Ferrar). The frame is valuable and when it is missed the employer sets a detective (E. H. Calvert) on the search for it. Things would have been all right if a crook (Bryant Washburn) had not stolen it from his room. There are some good things in the character line in it. Jules Ferrar's role gave no great chance, but he has utilized what he had with perfect naturalness. Mr. Commerford's playing in the picture's chief role is very commendable; he stirs sympathy. A very fair offering.

"THE HOSTAGE" (Patheplay), August 26.—An unusual picture with true desert scenes and real Arabs. We have not the slightest doubt that it was taken in the actual Sahara and it perfectly suggests the nomadic life of the desert's peoples. The photography is clear and often beautiful. It is these lesser things rather than the story which is very fair, however, that make it a fine offering. The story is simple and might be true, but is not strongly dramatic. The leading man over-acted all through his business and this took the edge off the story's reality.

Licensed Specials

"BREAKING INTO THE BIG LEAGUE" (Kalem), August 20.—A review of this two-part picture will be found on page 620 in the issue of August 9.

"THE LINE-UP" (Vitagraph), August 16.—A fine two-reel special offering which is in truth a feature. The story is of college life and its hero is the captain of a football team. We find the villain in the captain of the rival team, and the climax comes at the end of a fiercely contested football game which is the most exciting game we have ever seen on the screen. To see the picture is almost as good as to be a college man when the home football team wins. A tremendous crowd of spectators has been perfectly suggested. Their enthusiasm shows vividly the phases of the game and the changing of victory from the villain's to the hero's side. We cannot say that the story is wholly convincing, but is certainly effective, and the producer and players deserve high commendation. A very desirable offering, one to excite enthusiasm.

"THE WATER RAT" (Selig), August 25.—A two-part special offering featuring the well-known detective, Locksley, who has appeared in other offerings of Selig make. Several noticeable weak moments keep the picture from making as a whole a very marked impression; but, in spite of all, the story holds the interest. The audience seemed to enjoy it and not the less in that they could make fun of and get laughter from the awkward diving into the river of the "water rat" and others. This touch of comedy was unintentional, but left no ill effect on the picture as entertainment. The "water rat" (William Stowell) is a desperate crook who lives in a "house of mystery" near a river and is a society man when off duty. His robbery of some valuable jewels gets the picture's hero (Thomas Carrigan) unjustly suspected and is the final cause of his undoing; for Locksley (Charles Clary), at the plea of the heroine (Adrienne Kroell), trails him down. Some very cleverly made scenes make the story impressive in places, and some of the waterside photography is perfect. It is a safe offering, not a great one. The author is Frederick Ingram and it was produced by Oscar Eagle.

"THE FEUDISTS" (Vitagraph), August 23.—This two-reel comedy may not be as great a laughmaker as "A Regiment of Two," but it will make a lot of fun. The story is of two next-door neighbors who fall out. The feud extends to all the various members of the respective families except two—a young man and a young woman; these are very much in love. The heads of the families are Sydney Drew and Josie Sadler, John Bunny and Flora Finch. The lovers are Wallie Van and Lillian Walker. Much of the mirth will come when, with Drew and Bunny rolling over in the dust, and the members of the two families co-operating in the battle, Wallie Van upsets two beehives. An effort has been made, and with considerable success, to make the humor continuous rather than to bunch it in spots. James Oliver Curwood writes the script and Wilfrid North produces it.

"THE HUMAN BRIDGE" (Cines), August 26.—A sensational "Wild West" picture of life in the gold fields of Australia. It is full of action, which is entirely conventional and includes a good deal of hard riding, shooting, capture and rescue. It takes its name from the means by which the gang of the villains get across a deep and very dangerous looking but narrow canyon—the human bridge of acrobats. The country in which it was made is truly sensational with its lonely ridges, sharp declivities and abrupt breaks. The love story is crude.

Independent

"THE PURSUIT OF JANE" (Imp), September 4.—This comes very near being an excellent comedy of the smart type, but one or two lapses in costuming and plot rob it of this distinction. As it stands the summer resort love story is well pictured and of sufficient interest to be above the ordinary release. Jane Gail and Matt Moore play the leads.

"LOST IN THE NIGHT" (Crystal), September 7.—One of the best straight dramas we have seen by this company. Dick stops overnight with his friend Tom, putting the diamond necklace he is to deliver next day in the family strong box. Pearl robs the safe in the night, while asleep, hiding the necklace in a hollow tree. A year later, as she and her husband face ruin, she goes to the tree in her sleep and recovers the necklace. This story is consistent and entertaining, although it resembles a Pathe release in which Miss White appeared a year or two ago.

"MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING" (Crystal), September 2.—A note left in a book borrowed by Chester creates trouble with his wife, but all is settled when Miss White makes explanations. A good light plot.

"BALDY BELMONT AND THE OLD MAID" (Crystal), September 2.—In this the versatile Belmont hires out as a lady cook in order to win the affections of his old maid employer. Quite pleasing. On same reel with above.

"A VEGETARIAN'S DREAM (Eclair), September 7.—Movable drawings of vegetables, egg cups, peanuts, frogs, etc. Some amusing effects are achieved. The love drama enacted by the young onions was especially funny.

"THE TALE OF A FISH" (Gem), September 1.—Quite a neat little summer romance, written by C. B. Hoadley. Ethel Grandon is the popular girl at the resort. She pledges her hand to the suitor who catches the largest fish. Jack, her favorite, goes to sleep in a most unenthusiastic manner, but she fastens a big fish on his line. Delicate comedy, well pictured and nicely handled.

"MABEL'S NEW HERO" (Keystone), August 28.—A full reel comedy containing much that is genuinely funny, but also many broad, suggestive situations which will not commend it to the best houses; in fact, much of it is unfit for presentation anywhere.

"FEENEY'S SOCIAL EXPERIMENT" (Reliance), September 1.—This story, by Vaughn Kester, contains an ingenious situation and is full of good humor. Feeney and his workingmen friends turn tables on the millionaires, after the yacht has been wrecked, and proceed to put into action some of McCandish's socialistic teachings—well pictured and worth while.

"SAVED BY HIS CHILD" (Gaumont), August 26.—A small boy who shoots a desperate bank robber in the nick of time to save his father's life is the central figure in this drama of the Paris outlaw. The production is somewhat melodramatic, but it gets over in good shape.

"THE FATAL BELL," (Gaumont), September 2.—The treasurer of a large business enterprise, from a rather stagey motive, promises his wife to shoot himself on the stroke of five in this drama of Parisian life. He is led to this rash resolve because he has been accused of appropriating funds which his brother has, in fact, stolen. The situations created out of these materials are tense and dramatic. The story is well told throughout. The photography is very good.

"THE LADY KILLER" (Majestic), August 24.—A first-class comedy, depicting the fashion of certain women for lionizing celebrities. Lamar Johnstone appears as Adolph, the great pianist. He prefers frankfurters and sauerkraut, but is so constantly pursued by society women that he gets no peace and comfort. In the end he escapes, leaving one admirer in a supposed fainting fit. Quite pleasing.

"ONE-ROUND O'BRIEN'S FLIRTATION (Majestic), August 26.—Another One-Round O'Brien picture, featuring Fred Mace as the unfortunate pugilist with get-rich-quick ambitions. There is some good roughneck lovemaking in this and some interesting sparring. O'Brien's opponent was to lay down, but his anger rose because O'Brien flirted with his girl and he knocked the latter out. This is very laughable comedy of its kind.

"GOLD AND WATER" (Nestor), September 3.—The story does not make a promising start, but the last half shows a decided improvement and holds to the finish. The story is of a jumped claim. The rightful owner fortifies the only available well and compels capitulation of the jumpers.

"STEEL" (Eclair), September 3.—Two reels of melodrama with excellent photography and some very interesting backgrounds; but with not a character or figure that is at all admirable. The story is cheap; it gives a little suspense, but no emotion.

"THE GIRL SPY'S ATONEMENT" (Reliance), August 25.—In this film Norma Phillips gives us an attractive portrayal of the niece of a Southern general, who acts as a spy. The scenes occur off the field of battle and make a good, conventional story of love between the lines. The photography is very pleasing.

"THE SOCIAL SECRETARY" (Reliance), August 30.—A Forrest Halsey reel, in which the Spragg family are seen trying to break into high society. The situation is interesting. Miss De Lespine makes a good social secretary and has developed surprisingly in parts of this kind. She saves the girl from eloping with the rascally chauffeur, and then refuses to marry the son, in spite of the parents' willingness. A good society release.

"PEG OF THE POLLY P" (Reliance), August 27.—This is the best character comedy we have seen by this company for a long time. It is a canal boat story, by Forrest Halsey, and true to type in every respect. Big Bill goes to the barbershop and raises trouble with his rival's friend. He also upsets the dance on the canal boat, but he finally gets Peg, and all ends happily. The acting and setting are all that could be desired. A good comedy release.

"THE GAMBLER'S PAL" (Broncho), September 3.—Merely a Western episode, in which the woodsman's wife decides to go away with his former pal, the gambler. She starts, but on the way her conscience bothers her, and she returns. The pictures are good, but this can hardly be called a fully developed plot.

"MAY AND DECEMBER" (Broncho), September 7.—A one-reel offering, in which Anson White tries to force a marriage with the girl because he holds a note against her father. She meets a fleeing circus performer in the woods, who is being pursued for a crime he is presumed to have committed. White captures the acrobat, but later he is found innocent and robs his captor of his clothing. The story swings from drama into comedy rather abruptly, but makes fair entertainment.

"THE TRAIL OF THE SERPENT" (Imp), September 1.—The woman who played the part of the designing stenographer in this showed evidences of ability, but the story as shown was full of absurd situations and has but little appeal. The woman was too bold in her operations to lend credibility to the plot. The last scene, where she was found dead in the vault, had a touch of real drama about it, and was by far the strongest incident in the film.

"WON BY A SKIRT" (Nestor), September 5.—Though the photography in some of the opening scenes of this number was too light, as a whole the story will prove a laughing success. It treads on dangerous ground in some places, where the young man masquerades as a girl and enters the young ladies' seminary, but is so well acted that it escapes vulgarity and brings many laughs. A good offering.

"THE LIGHT WOMAN" (Rex), September 7.—This adaptation from Robert Browning will make strong appeal to women. One of the keen feminine members of the censorship board was overheard to remark that it was "grand." It is well played by Phillips Smalley and Lois Weber. There are charming and extensive backgrounds—in fact, good staging throughout. The photography is excellent.

"A TERRIBLE NIGHT" (Solax), August 27.—A comedy of errors in which a family consisting of father, mother, brother and sister is stricken at the same time with fear of burglars and each mistakes the other for the burglar, with the result that they all land in cells at the police station. The humor is light and has a broad appeal.

"THE SIMPLE LIFE" (Rex).—What is intended for smart comedy of a breezy sort, but in reality it goes over the line too far and becomes very suggestive. An additional scene at the beginning, revealing the marriage of the supposed bachelor to his young housekeeper, at least to the audience would have improved appearances.

"HABITS OF FIELD SPIDERS" (Eclair), September 7.—Close views of numerous varieties of the spider family. Rather creepy, but interesting from a scientific standpoint, particularly the demonstrations of web spinning, fly catching, etc. A half reel number.

"BABY DAY" (Keystone), August 25.—Ford and Mabel and the other Keystone merrymakers romp through a California baby show and create considerable excitement. They forgot to take very much of a plot along with them, but get a few smiles just the same.

"THE KELP INDUSTRY" (Keystone), August 25.—This, on same reel with above, is a very interesting exposition of the manner in which kelp is taken from along the California coast and made into baskets, toys, etc.

"FATTY'S DAY OFF" (Keystone), September 1.—The fat boy takes a very reckless ride in a wheel chair, winding up by falling off a pier. Good comedy without offensive situations.

"LOS ANGELES HARBOR" (Keystone), September 1.—On same reel with above. A very interesting and instructive view of the wonderful harbor which was 16 years in building and contains seven square miles of breakwater. A good release.

"BETWEEN HOME AND COUNTRY" (Reliance), September 3.—A brisk episode of Civil War days, occurring between the lines of the opposing armies. With but little of the paraphernalia of warfare to aid them, the characters in this succeed in working up a tense situation. Stanley Walpole did very creditable work indeed in the part of the spy, and Miss De Lespine had the leading feminine role. There was considerable overacting on the part of certain minor characters. A good number.

"WHILE THERE'S LIFE" (American), September 1.—A familiar plot, amateurishly handled. The characters were not well identified in the beginning and it takes the observer some time to get them well in mind. The young doctor loses his eyesight; his selfish wife goes ahead with her stage work, and the sister alone befriends him. The close was not entirely satisfactory, the observer being left in a puzzled state of mind as to the outcome of it all.

"FLIRTY FLORENCE" (Frontier), September 4.—A picture of the circus blackmailer and her ways. "Flirty Florence" is the wife of the circus man and he has chosen for her victim a rich lawyer who is happily married. The man seems too easily captivated by her wiles to be truly interesting and, since the beating that his wife gives him when she finds him with the woman, is all his punishment, we are not sympathetic on the score of his fate. "Flirty Florence" has personality, she convinces us more than any other character and to see her end in jail doesn't excite our mirth. In fact, the offering is weak, chiefly because it uses tragic material of which to make a comedy; for that is the picture's intention.

"MAYA, JUST AN INDIAN" (Frontier), August 30.—Bill strikes gold while living with his Indian bride. He deserts her, thinking he is carrying the gold with him, but she has replaced it with rocks. Two years later Bill's second wife becomes sick and the Indian girl brings the gold to them. This story somehow lacked conviction, though the scenes are quite attractive.

"A MUCH WANTED BABY" (Frontier), August 28.—A simple comedy which will be followed with much interest wherever shown. The baby is passed around from one to another until all concerned become greatly attached to it. Only with great difficulty does the real father and mother regain possession of it. A good release.

"THE POISONED CHOP" (American), September 4.—An entertaining story, illustrating fairly well the danger of placing poisoned meat out for a dog. Mr. Green tried the poisoned meat as a last attempt to get rid of the family dog. The child was supposed to have eaten it, then the tramp, and later it was served up on the table with other chops.

"THE MYSTERIOUS EYES" (American), September 6.—While not entirely convincing, this film story is full of interest and will be followed eagerly by observers. The girl at the inn with her father discovers the innkeeper looking through the eyes of a painting on the wall at them. Fearing robbery, she escapes on her horse. The situation is an eerie one and might have been handled in a little more probable way. At the same time it is entertaining.

"FRAZZLED FINANCE" (Thanhouser), August 31.—The old maid catches a chicken thief and induces him to dress up in swell clothes and pose as her admirer. In this way she brings back the regard of her former lover. The plot is quite unique and entertaining, but the photos were somewhat hazy in places.

Independent Specials

"THE IRON MASTER" (Kay-Bee), September 5.—A two-reel war drama with many new features and a strong climax. Some of the opening scenes have a rather modern atmosphere about them—greater care should be used to keep photographs, modern furniture, etc., out of these wartime settings. The fighting centers in the attack on the iron mills and was very well staged. The love story is consistent and appealing.

"THE OATH OF CONCHITA" (Nestor), September 1.—Here are two thousand feet of juvenile hairlifter. It would have been a far more desirable release as a single reel. Three men are in love with an Indian girl, portrayed by Mona Darkfeather. One of them is an Indian, who almost continually is trailing one of his rivals, long knife in hand; the second is a Spanish grandee, who wins the girl but is killed by the Indian; the third is a priest, who, however, conceals his passion from the girl, but not from the Indian.

"THE EVIL POWER" (Rex), September 4.—An effective melodrama in two reels that is weird and terrible. It deals with a hypnotist who gets weak women in his power so that, after a sufficient measure of suspense, they may be rescued. The early scenes are weak and do not help the story as much as they should. They introduce the first victim, a girl whom the evil man merely needs to help in his conquest of the second victim, the wife of a prominent business man. The producer, perhaps knowing that some strong scenes were coming, did not take enough trouble to make the evil man's method of meeting the second victim convincing—it is poor. After that, though, the story is well planned and effective; it gets one under its spell strongly. It is well acted by the five chief characters; the photography is clear and effective; and the backgrounds have an Asiatic touch now and then that helps. Where such stories are liked, this will go strongly. It was produced by Otis Turner from the script of himself and D. F. Wilcox.

"THE SMUGGLER'S CHILD" (Solax), August 22.—This two part drama of the deep sea is a very good picture of an age when smuggling was much more romantic than it is now. The scenes and the costumes are very pleasing. In the story an old episode is given a quaint twist when a widow, the heroine of the play, puts her babe on board a smuggler's vessel. Most of the following incident centers about this child, to no disadvantage of the interest. The little fellow's adventures among the rough freebooters likewise compels sympathy, and if the ending is rather conventional in that the widow marries the captain of the smugglers, the unique situations created by introducing a child into such crude and violent atmosphere make the film as a whole a pretty fair offering.

"THE BLINDNESS OF COURAGE, OR BETWEEN TWO LOVES" (Dragon).—These three reels present an interpretation of the times when the cavalier was abroad in Virginia and the Carolinas with a sword at his side and a challenge on his lip. It was a period of strong passions, of heady adventures and strange undertakings. This spirit has been well translated in the drama. It tells the story of a capricious lady, the daughter of a Colonial governor, who sends two rivals for her hand on the dangerous mission of robbing the body of an Indian chief of his burial feathers. The worthier of the two brings back the feathers and wins the girl, but he is blinded in the effort and this is a slight dramatic defect because it leaves the girl under a cloud of blame. But the story is well told, the action is anything but halting and interest is well sustained.

"FADED BEAUTIES" (Great Northern), August 30.—The characterization of old Major Kurt in this comedy is very commendable. The fun grows out of his call on the sweetheart of his youth when both have grown too old to be foolish. A mutual disillusionment results, which is strictly in accord with the probabilities and yet leaves the spectator satisfied. The play is well worked out.

BRENNAN OF THE MOOR" (Solax), Feature Release.—This a three-reel production, featuring Barney Gilmore, who plays the title role to good effect. He is ably seconded by the others in the cast. The story is that of "Brennan of Moor," a breezy, witty Irish outlaw who "stole from the rich to give to the poor," having been driven to this kind of life by persecutions of the English, which robbed him of his estate and his father. Barney's adventures are amusing and startlingly interesting. Two incidents commend themselves particularly. They relate to Barney's escape from prison. In the first his cell is flooded with water and he barely escapes drowning. This scene is well done. In the second he presses three roadside athletes into service for a human bridge on which he crosses a stream to elude pursuers. This is a striking expedient. But Barney's whole record as a highwayman will command attention and a warm sympathy for him. The play is worthy of being featured.

GEORGE SIEGMAN.

The dean of the Reliance acting forces is George Siegman. In point of service he is the oldest member of the company, although a young man still. His heroic stature is the reason why he is frequently referred to by his friends and associates as "Big George," for he stands six feet two and weighs in at 225 pounds. As an interpreter of herculean roles he is without a peer, both as to size and quality of work; for besides posessing a splendid physique he has an excellent technique—and brains.

George Siegman.

While usually democratic and amiable, he is serious minded, and a real man all the way through. Mr. Siegman is the ideal portrayer of manly roles. He shines in such parts as a village blacksmith, a football hero, a pirate chief, a pugilist, a burglar on the Bill Sykes order, a Roman gladiator, a strike leader, a ranch foreman, and others. Some of his best work of recent date may be seen in "Half a Chance" in which he plays the part of Frisco Pete; also strong leads in "The Hardest Way," "The Smuggler and The Smuggler's Sister," and as Pierrot in "The Love of Columbine."

Mr. Siegman is a New Yorker born. He began his theatrical career, after leaving the Boston public schools, with the Castle Square Stock Company of that city. He gained there a valuable experience which secured him a place among Charles Frohman's players, and for four years he appeared in "To Have and To Hold." He next was sent with Eleanor Robson's company in "Salomy Jane," with which he continued as long as the piece was played. He then joined "Under Southern Skies" and continued with it during the period of its big city showing. He then left the legitimate and entered vaudeville for a season with Joe Welch's production of "Blackwell's Island."

In 1907 George joined the Biograph Company from spring until fall. The next summer season found him with the Edison Company. There was a brief return to the footlights, after which he joined the Reliance Company, with which he is now in his third year.

NIGHT PHOTOGRAPHY.

An extraordinary achievement in night photography was accomplished recently by Director Huntley and Operator Wycoff, of the Selig Polyscope Company, in California, which promises to make the silhouetted syk-line of Los Angeles famed the world over. The cameraman planted his instrument on top of Broadway Hill over the tunnel, and after the lamps had begun to twinkle he secured a perfect film of the "City of the Angels," after dark. The lighting system of Los Angeles is in detail and in decoration the most perfect of any city in this country, and the effect secured with the pencils of light and the facades of buildings lining the streets out clearly against the sky was beautiful, giving an effect like fairyland. The success of this experiment means a great deal in the art of photoplay. The particular drama in which this scene will be used is entitled "The Shadow of the Bridge." It will be utilized in the form of a dissolve, the visions materializing as the fabric of a dream.

THE Eclair company will release during September a feature entitled "A Puritan Episode." It is a good picture. Much care has been given to the production. With the exception of one or two players the cast contains all of the best on the roster of the company. There is, however, one incident in the story as worked out that deserves especial attention. It is an offense against history—and the offense is not to be excused or condoned by the plea that on the point in question authorities differ. Furthermore, it is a second offense for the Eclair company. Still worse, the company is to be charged with confirming a popular fallacy. In the picture in question Miss Stuart—whose work in portraying the woman crazed by grief is splendidly, artistically done—is represented as being burned at the stake for the crime of witchcraft. (In 1692 witchcraft was a capital crime in Massachusetts, made so by the first code to be constructed by English colonists in New England, in 1641).

Two dozen persons were executed in Massachusetts for witchcraft. Twenty-three of these were hanged; one, stern old Giles Corey, who refused to plead either guilty or not guilty, was pressed to death. Not one was burned. John Fiske, whose researches in American history certainly constitute him an authority, in one of his works specifically states that no person was ever burned at the stake in New England for witchcraft. Of course, there is no denying that it is simpler and more spectacular to show in pictures a burning at the stake than it is to represent a hanging; but the exigencies of the moment furnish no adequate excuse for falsifying history the facts of which are easily available, even in Fort Lee.

J. M. O'Dowd, of Florence, S. C., lessee and general manager of the Auditorium, a picture house seating 700 persons, was a caller at the World office last week. Mr. O'Dowd is one of the progressive exhibitors of the South, and one of the successful ones, too. His prosperity is due in no small measure to the intelligent supervision which he has given to his programs. He is a believer in the value of scientific and educational pictures, especially as an attraction for those who have never closely followed motion pictures.

Joe Brandt, the publicity man of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, sailed for London on Tuesday morning. At the pier to see him off were Carl Laemmle, president of the company; others of his business associates, who, by the way, presented him with a valuable traveling bag; a delegation from the Screen Club and personal friends. Motion pictures were taken at the ship. When the film is developed it will be forwarded to Mr. Brandt, who will then introduce the New York "bunch" to his new friends across the water.

George U. Stevenson will have charge of Mr. Brandt's department in his absence. Assisting him will be Harvey Gates, who comes to the Universal from the Dramatic Mirror. Mr. Gates' special duty will be to look out for the publication of the Universal Weekly, work for which he is eminently qualified. Although he has been in the picture game but a year he has shown a grasp of screen matters which augurs well for his future. Within the last few months Mr. Gates has sold half a dozen scripts, practically all he has written. Mr. Stevenson has a wide acquaintance in the trade. He brings to his work a rare cordiality of manner—a valuable asset. His friends will wish him all success.

Matt B. Snyder, the veteran actor who last winter "broke into" pictures, and with success, has left us and gone to the Pacific Coast. He says he may never return. The occasion of his journey was the marriage of his daughter, Georgie Florence, to Albert Herman Herbert, which took place in San Francisco July 23. Mr. Snyder will make his home with his daughter. It was last spring that the one-time Annapolis man, later skipper of blockade runners, Confederate soldier and follower of Kirby Smith into Mexico in the days following the Civil War, celebrated his seventy-fourth birthday. You'd never guess the age. In spite of the striking white beard Mr. Snyder hardly looks sixty. He is a most interesting companion—full of reminiscences of his many years on the stage and of well-known players with whom he has been associated. The Screeners who gather at the clubrooms on Saturday afternoon when the weather is cool will miss him.

That was an interesting split subject which Pathe put out August 20 under—or should one say after—the title of "Strange Traits of Serpents." The snakes were filmed under the direction of Raymond Ditmars, curator of reptiles in the New York Zoo. In the days before Mr. Ditmars came to his present prominence as an authority on reptiles he was a reporter on the New York Times. His habit at that time of carrying in his pockets snakes commonly supposed to be deadly was a source of constant nervousness and sometimes of terror to his associates. On some occasions when the head of a reptile would be seen protruding from his coat pocket Mr. Ditmars found himself suddenly alone in the news room. It was related of him at that time that his practice of taking his "pets" home with him was the cause of decided protests on the part of his parents. Certainly the manner in which the snakes were handled in the making of the picture proves Mr. Ditmars' familiarity with his dangerous friends.

A card from David Horsley states that he is still thoroughly enjoying himself in Europe. On August 12 he left Paris for Switzerland and Italy. Mr. Horsley writes that he has met many Americans connected with the picture industry. He will sail for home on September 3.

Walter E. Green, who for the past four years has been with the Edison Company as assistant sales manager, is now with the Gaumont Company, of Flushing. Mr. Green will be the traveling representative of his company. He will take his goods with him and demonstrate to film men the quality of the Gaumont product.

Edwin August, who is making pictures for the Universal company on the West coast, will soon begin work on a multiple-reel film that will be his biggest yet. Since Mr. August has been producing his own pictures he has turned out three successful double-reelers and is now working on the fourth.

Albert W. Hale, who is directing Majestic pictures, writes of an unusual coincidence at the recent Santa Monica road race. It was decided to make a picture around the race. The story was of a driver, with a wife in hospital, entering a contest and winning. Earl P. Cooper agreed to take the part of the driver. "But the scenario shows that our man wins, so you must finish first," admonished Hale. Cooper did win. The fact that Cooper's wife was ill in a hospital at the time the race was on and that the driver received from her such reports as he could during the running gave a touch of realism to the filming of the story that is unusual. The title of the picture will be "For His Loved One."

O. M. Gove, cameraman for the Kalem Santa Monica (Cal.) comedy company, is on a vacation in the East. He dropped in at the World office on Wednesday to inquire in regard to old friends in town. During Mr. Gove's visit a summer shower brought from the Kalem man the statement that it was the first rain he had seen in five months. Mr. Gove when with the Biograph company filmed the first full reel of pictures taken in Southern California. He is a lifelong photographer, having been in business at one time in Australia. Before his return to the coast he will visit New Hampshire, his native State, and ramble among the White Mountains.

Can you beat it? Here was I, wondering what fact of interest more or less remote to picture lovers could be dug up to complete this page. In walks John Steppling—rare John Steppling would be the old-fashioned way of expressing it; and it would be true today—who makes known the fact that he has come in to say good-bye for a while; that on Saturday, August 30, he takes train for the Pacific Coast. Mr. Steppling will be one of the leading members of a company now being recruited in New York for stock work in the Savoy Theater, San Francisco. His departure from the screen will be regretted by the thousands of his admirers who for over two years have followed his work with the Essanay company. May his absence be short. His last picture work was done here with the Famous Players, where he appeared as the father of Tess, in the support of Mrs. Fiske in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," and in the company of Mary Pickford in "In the Bishop's Carriage." Hands have been shaken and good-bye said. There is a personal note in this paragraph, and no attempt will be made to conceal the fact. I had looked forward to jolly good times this winter with a splendid fellow who is corking good company. Well, we can't be stopped from hoping for other winters, anyway.

FOR THE CROWN.

The second of the "Adventures of Jacques," which production proved immensely popular throughout the American continent and is proving a big hit abroad. Lorimer Johnston is the author and producer and much credit is due him for the splendid settings, the perfect costuming and great care with which the most minute details are worked out.

Scene from "For the Crown" (American).

Warren Kerrigan again plays the port of Jacques and his dramatization of the character is immense, he very ably portrays the cavalier of the Louis XIV period and is intelligently supported by a talented cast including Vivian Rich, Jack Richardson, George Periolat, Louise Lester and a host of others whose faces are very rapidly becoming very popular with moving picture fans.

Little Helen Armstrong deports herself as the infant king in a most admirable and commendable style and lends a very apt touch of child life to the production.
